The bill (S. 4170) to redivide the State of Florida into judicial districts was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying petitions favoring its passage, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. I also present a memorial of members of the bar and citizens of Columbia County, Fla., and a memorial of members of the bar and citizens of Duval County, Fla., and two letters and two telegrams from citizens of Florida, remonstrating against the passage of the bill. I move that the memorials be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, to accompany the bill just introduced by me.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. VEST introduced a bill (S. 4171) to amend "An act granting additional quarantine powers and imposing additional duties upon the Marine-Hospital Service," approved February 15, 1893; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Health and National Quarantine.

Mr. WOLCOTT introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (S. 4172) granting an increase of pension to Charles P. Koch;

A bill (S. 4173) granting an increase of pension to Walter S. Wikoff; and

A bill (S. 4174) granting an increase of pension to Daniel Clark.

Mr. TILLMAN introduced a bill (S. 4175) to provide for sittings of the circuit and district courts of South Carolina in the city of Florence, S. C.; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. DANIEL introduced a bill (S. 4176) to erect a monument at Winchester, Va., to the memory of Gen. Daniel Morgan; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Library.

AMENDMENT TO NAVAL BILL.

Mr. PENROSE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1535) to provide for the examination of certain officers of the Navy and to regulate promotion therein; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. FRYE submitted an amendment providing that the Adjutant-General of the Army shall have the rank, pay, and allowances of a major-general in the Army of the United States, intended to be proposed by him to the Army appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. TILLMAN submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $6,000 to complete the interior of the new post-office and court-house building by painting and frescoing the same, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

REPORT OF WORLD'S COLUMBIAN COMMISSION.

Mr. ALLISON submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate of the United States (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed of the final report of the Board of Lady Managers of the World's Columbian Commission 7,500 copies; of which 2,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 4,000 copies for the use of the House, 500 copies for the State Department, and 1,000 copies to be delivered to Mrs. Potter Palmer, president of said board of lady managers, for distribution by her to members of home and foreign commissions.

REPORT ON EDUCATION IN PORTO RICO.

Mr. NELSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to transmit to the Senate the report of General Davis, commanding Porto Rico, containing the report on education in the island, by Dr. Victor S. Clark, for the period ending February last.

REPORT ON THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

Mr. LODGE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Senate document room 2,000 additional copies of Senate Document No. 171, being the report of the Senate Committee on the Philippines on the Philippine Islands.

AGES OF EMPLOYEES IN EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, was ordered to lie on the table and be printed:

To the Senate:

I transmit herewith a communication from the Secretary of State, forwarding the report of Commander G. W. Baird, United States Navy, superintendent of the State, War, and Navy Department building, respecting the employees of his office, furnished in response to the Senate resolution of March 16, 1900.

WILLIAM McKINLEY.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, April 12, 1900.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CULLOM submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8347) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 17, 22, 40, 44, 45, 52, 53, 55, 62, 63, 64, 79, 80, 88, 89, 93, 94, 105, 106, 116, 124, 155, 163, 184, 200, 201, 202, 203, 204, and 246.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 2, 3, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 18, 19, 20, 21, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 41, 43, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 54, 56, 58, 59, 60, 61, 65, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 81, 82, 83, 85, 86, 87, 90, 91, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100, 101, 102, 103, 104, 107, 109, 115, 117, 118, 119, 120, 121, 122, 123, 125, 126, 127, 128, 129, 130, 131, 132, 133, 134, 135, 136, 137, 138, 139, 140, 141, 142, 143, 144, 145, 146, 147, 148, 149, 151, 152, 153, 154, 157, 158, 159, 160, 161, 162, 164, 165, 166, 167, 168, 169, 170, 171, 172, 173, 175, 177, 178, 179, 180, 181, 183, 185, 188, 191, 192, 193, 196, 197, 198, 205, 206, 207, 208, 209, 210, 211, 212, 214, 215, 216, 217, 218, 219, 221, 222, 223, 225, 226, 227, 229, 230, 231, 232, 233, 234, 235, 236, 237, 238, 239, 240, 241, 242, 243, 244, 245, 248, 249, 250, 251, 252, 253, 254, 255, 256, 257, and 258, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: At the end of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "Five Civilized Tribes of Indians;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 4, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$122,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 5, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the number proposed insert "21;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 6, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$37,800;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 23, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$15,620;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 42, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$6,080;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 52, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "Chief of division, $1,500;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 57, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$6,080;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 66, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$5,060;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 84, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "For compensation of the Vice-President of the United States from March 3, 1901, $2,622.23;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 92, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 29 of the bill, in line 24, after the word "library," insert ", and to enable the Secretary of State to purchase for the library of the Department of State books and manuscripts, including a collection of books and pamphlets bearing upon the history of the war of the Revolution formerly in the library of Gen. Sir Henry Clinton, commander in chief of the British forces in America during that period, the same having been richly annotated in his hand;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 108, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$13,200;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 110, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$1,400;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 111, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$294,500;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 112, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the number proposed insert "five;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 113, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the number proposed insert "twenty-two;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 114, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$65,770;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 150, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 3 of the matter inserted by said amendment, strike out the word "permanent;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 156, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$165,080;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 174, and agree to the same with amendments as follows: Omit the matter inserted by said amendment, and on page 83 of the bill, in line 1, strike out the words "of class 3;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 176, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$10,640;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 182, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Restore the matter stricken out by said amendment amended as follows: On page 83 of the bill, in line 14, after the word "Office," insert the words ", at Washington, D. C.;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 186, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "and for the establishment of a branch office at Galveston;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 187, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$30,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 189, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Restore the matter stricken out by said amendment amended as follows: On page 85 of the bill, in line 8, after the word "Office," insert the words ", at Washington, D. Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. CULLOM. I do not know that it is worth while for me to say anything about this report. I will make one general remark. The bill is very little changed from what it was when it passed the Senate. The Library involved a good many questions of difference, but the result of the conference between the two Houses was that the force desired by the Librarian was granted, but no increase of salaries was given. There are very few amendments that are of any importance that the Senate did not make itself.

The report was agreed to.

SENATOR FROM KENTUCKY.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I present, as part of the credentials of Hon. J. C. S. Blackburn, the certificate of the clerk of the senate, intended to correct a clerical error which was made in the first certificate sent from him. I ask that it be printed and attached to the previous document.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That it be printed in the RECORD?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I ask that it be printed as a document and that it be attached to the previous papers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order will be made. The paper will be placed on the file.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION—PORTO RICAN TARIFF.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Mr. President, I notice in the RECORD that, on page 4069, Mr. DOLLIVER on yesterday is reported to have used the following language in the House of Representatives:

I accuse the chairman of the Democratic national committee of being in the same conspiracy, if you will permit me so to speak. I hold in my hand a proposed amendment offered by Senator JONES of Arkansas to the bill, now become a law, to give the proceeds of the present Porto Rican customs to the people of Porto Rico, an amendment which, if it had been passed, would have given to the American Sugar Refining Company $1,800,000, which they have already paid in cash into the Treasury of the United States on sugar imported from Porto Rico. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. President, I as a rule pay no attention to aspersions of this character; but as this is the second time this has been done during this session in the House, it may be possible that some honest man may be misled or may misjudge me if I should take that course in this instance.

When the Porto Rican bill was presented in the Senate I offered an amendment proposing to refund to the people who paid them the duties which had been collected from the people of Porto Rico. I did that from the conviction that the Government of the United States had no right to levy any tariff duties upon products coming from Porto Rico; and if we had no such right, it was common honesty that we should give the money back to the people from whom we had taken it. I still believe that this is right.

I had never looked to see who had paid these revenues. I am not in confidence of the sugar trust. I am not one who is familiar with its officers. I know nothing about it. They have not come to me to complain that they paid $1,800,000. I did not know that such was the fact. Men who are more familiar with the doings of the sugar trust, of course, knew more about that than I, and it may be correct that they have paid a million and a half of money into the Treasury of the United States. What I understood the facts to be were that protests had been made when these duties were levied and collected, and had appeal from the ruling of the Department to the courts, and that these cases were pending in the Supreme Court of the United States, and I believe that when the Supreme Court decides this question it will direct that if this money was improperly collected, as I believe it was, that then this money shall be paid back to the men who paid it.

I believe in doing justice, no matter who is involved. I believe in giving the devil his due, and if we have no right under the laws of the land to levy this tax, and the sugar trust has paid a part of it and the money is due to them, it ought to be refunded.

I have no fear of being misjudged by any member of this body. I know that no improper motive will be attributed to me by any man in this body, and I know that it can not be justly done anywhere else.

Another word, Mr. President, before I conclude. I offered this amendment in the course of the debate here. It was stated here afterwards that a large part of the money that had been paid was paid by the sugar trust and the tobacco trust. I withdrew the amendment. No vote was ever taken on it. After discussion I made up my mind that the proper thing to do was to leave that matter to be settled by the courts; that having gone to the length we had, it was better to let the courts say whether or not the action of the Government was legal, and if not, to correct the evil.

ABANDONED PROPERTY IN INSURRECTIONARY DISTRICTS.

Mr. MASON. I desire to ask unanimous consent that a vote be taken on Senate bill 602 one week from to-day, at 1 o'clock. I will state the reason. The bill was introduced by the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS], and after being reported from the Committee on Claims was called up on the 23d of January last. The bill was read and the report was read and the Senator from Minnesota addressed the Senate in support of the bill. There may be Senators who wish to speak in opposition to the bill. It is a bill known as the bill for the payment of claims arising under the captured and abandoned property act. I thought, as the bill has been read and the report read and the Senator from Minnesota has addressed the Senate upon the subject, one week from to-day, at 1 o'clock, would give an opportunity to those who oppose the bill to oppose it.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. What bill is it?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois asks unanimous consent that one week from to-day at 1 o'clock, a vote be taken on the following bill.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 602) to revive and amend an act to provide for the collection of abandoned property and the prevention of frauds in insurrectionary districts within the United States, and acts amendatory thereof.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. That is the bill to refund the cotton taxes?

Mr. MASON. No; it is not the cotton-tax bill. It is a bill which has been reported favorably for the last twelve or fifteen years, ever since the Supreme Court decided that the Government held the——

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. It is the captured and abandoned property bill?

Mr. MASON. That is it.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I do not feel that I can make any agreement this morning without an opportunity to examine the matter a little further. I do not wish to prevent an early vote after proper discussion and examination, but I think I must object this morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. MONEY. Before the matter goes over, I should like to ask the Senator from Connecticut if he would be willing to name any other time for its consideration?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I do not think that we ought to make an agreement offhand as to the time when we will take a vote on a particular bill which has not been before the Senate for consideration.

Mr. MASON. I will state to the Senator——

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I want an opportunity to examine the matter myself and to consider how much time can be given to the discussion of it before I agree to any particular day.

SENATOR FROM PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. WARREN. I ask unanimous consent to call up a bill of a few lines that it is very necessary to have passed and one which will lead to no discussion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning business is closed, and the Chair lays before the Senate a resolution which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution reported by Mr. TURLEY from the Committee on Privileges and Elections January 23, 1900, as follows:

Resolved, That the Hon. Matthew S. Quay is not entitled to take his seat in this body as a Senator from the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. WARREN. It is a matter of two or three moments. It is a very short bill.

Mr. BURROWS. Will it take any time?

Mr. WARREN. I think not. I will withdraw it if it leads to any discussion.

Mr. BURROWS. Very well; I yield to the Senator.

FEES OF JURORS AND WITNESSES.

Mr. WARREN. I ask for the present consideration of the bill (S. 3488) to amend an act fixing the fees of jurors and witnesses in United States courts in certain States and Territories.

The Secretary read the bill; and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to amend the act entitled "An act fixing the fees of jurors and witnesses in the United States courts in certain States and Territories," approved August 3, 1892; so as to read:

That jurors and witnesses in the United States courts, and witnesses in courts held by United States commissioners and other judicial officers and committing magistrates having jurisdiction in cases to which the United States is a party, in the States of Wyoming, Montana, Washington, Oregon, California, Nevada, Idaho, Colorado, and Utah, and in the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona, shall be entitled to and receive 15 cents for each mile necessarily traveled over any stage line or by private conveyance, and 5 cents for each mile over any railway, in going to and returning from said courts: Provided, That no constructive or double mileage fees shall be allowed by reason of any person being summoned both as witness and juror, or as witness in two or more cases pending in the same court and triable at the same term thereof.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BROOKLYN FERRY COMPANY.

Mr. DEPEW. I hope the Senator from Michigan will yield to me, in order that I may ask unanimous consent for the consideration and passage of a bill, which will take but a moment. If there is any objection to it, I shall withdraw it. It is Senate bill 3535.

Mr. BURROWS. I yield to the Senator.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill, which will be read for information.

The bill (S. 3535) for the relief of the Brooklyn Ferry Company, of New York, was read; and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, in section 1, page 2, line 6, after the word "liability," to strike out the words "with costs and interests;" so as to make the section read:

That the claim against the United States of the Brooklyn Ferry Company, of New York, a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of New York, with its principal place of business in the borough of Brooklyn, city of New York, owner of the ferryboat New York, for damages caused by collision between the said ferryboat and the U. S. S. Dolphin, in the East River, near Brooklyn, on the 1st day of August, 1899, may be sued for by the said ferry company in the United States district court for the eastern district of New York sitting as a court of admiralty and acting under the rules governing such court, and said court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine such a suit and to enter a judgment or decree for the amount of such damages, if any shall be found to be due, against the United States in favor of the said ferry company, upon the same principles and measure of liability as in like cases in admiralty between private parties, and with the same rights of appeal.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INTEROCEANIC CANAL.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. BURROWS. I should be very glad to do so, but my remarks will be quite lengthy at best; and unless it is something very special the Senator desires, I should prefer that he should defer his request until the conclusion of my remarks.

Mr. MORGAN. It is something very especial and very important too, I think, Mr. President. I merely wanted to ask unanimous consent of the Senate to fix the Nicaraguan Canal bill as the regular order for Monday, the 30th day of April, at 2 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Michigan yield for that purpose?

Mr. BURROWS. I yield for that request, but not for discussion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the bill known as the Nicaraguan Canal bill may be assigned for consideration on the 30th day of April at 2 o'clock.

Mr. LODGE. I do not see how I can assent to that to the displacement of the bill that I have in charge, which is now the unfinished business.

Mr. MORGAN. I shall feel bound to antagonize the Senator's bill with the canal bill this morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] is entitled to the floor.

SENATOR FROM PENNSYLVANIA.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution reported by Mr. TURLEY from the Committee on Privileges and Elections January 23, 1900, as follows:

Resolved, That the Hon. Matthew S. Quay is not entitled to take his seat in this body as a Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. President, it is never a pleasant duty for one to differ with any considerable number of his party associates, especially upon a measure of party policy; but when the question in controversy is not, or at least ought not to be, in any sense a party issue, but is entirely dependent upon the higher consideration of constitutional construction, the embarrassment largely disappears. My views upon questions of this character have not been hastily formed nor now for the first time publicly expressed.

Two years ago Henry W. Corbett presented a letter from the governor of the State of Oregon commissioning him to a seat in this Chamber, made vacant by the expiration of the term of Senator Mitchell. The right of the executive to make such appointment was questioned by the Senate, the oath of office withheld, and the matter referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. As an humble member of that committee it became my duty at that time, with other members of the committee, to examine the question and, as the result of such examination, I was forced to the conclusion that the power of appointment in that case was not lodged with the executive, and a majority of the committee so reported. The Senate sustained that report by a vote of 50 to 19. Since that time I have seen nothing to cause me to reverse my judgment; further examination has served rather to strengthen and confirm it. The material facts in this case are the same as in that. The Constitution is the same. The precedents are the same. The only change is in the name of the party seeking admission to the Senate. Then it was ex-Senator Corbett; now it is ex-Senator Quay. A change of parties certainly ought not to and I am confident will not produce a change of convictions.

THE ISSUE DEFINED.

The issue in this controversy is circumscribed within very narrow limits. It is solely a question of constitutional construction. The facts are not in dispute.

By the Constitution of the United States it is provided that—

The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the legislature thereof for six years; * * * and if vacancies happen by resignation or otherwise during the recess of the legislature of any State the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies.

A recital of the facts in this case, in connection with the foregoing provisions of the Constitution, will disclose the exact question involved. In 1893 the legislature of the State of Pennsylvania elected Matthew S. Quay a Senator for the full term of six years from the 4th of March, 1893. He accepted and held such office until the expiration of the term, March 3, 1899. The legislature failed to elect his successor, and as a consequence such office became vacant on the 4th of March, 1899. The legislature was in session, however, at the time such vacancy occurred, and had been since the 2d of January previous, and continued in session until the 20th of April, 1899, when it adjourned sine die without electing a successor to Senator Quay for the succeeding term of six years. Thereafter, and on the 21st of April, 1899, the governor of the State appointed and commissioned Matthew S. Quay to hold the office of Senator "until the next meeting of the legislature," invoking as his authority for such action the provision of the Constitution already quoted, namely:

If vacancies happen during the recess of the legislature by resignation, or otherwise, the executive of the State may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies.

The commission by virtue of which Mr. Quay asks to be admitted to the membership of this body was, upon its presentation to the Senate, referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections for preliminary examination and report. That committee, after full consideration and argument by counsel on either side, report—

That the Hon. Matthew S. Quay is not entitled to take a seat in this body as a Senator from the State of Pennsylvania.

That report, together with the views of the minority, is now submitted to the Senate for its considerate judgment and final action.

The sole question, therefore, presented for the consideration of the Senate is whether this vacancy, occurring on the 4th of March, 1899, in the manner stated, and when the legislature was in session, is such a vacancy, within the meaning of the Constitution, as the governor of the State could supply by temporary appointment. If it is, then the right of Mr. Quay to a seat in this body, by virtue of the governor's commission, is unquestioned and unquestionable. If it is not, then such appointment is wholly without authority of law, and the commission issued in pursuance thereof utterly null and void. This is the only controversy, and to its consideration I invoke the serious attention of the Senate.

The question is one which ought, and I am sure will, command the deliberate and unbiased judgment of every Senator, involving, as it does, not only the claim of a citizen to membership in this body, which is of course of some moment to the individual, but, above that, it involves the right of a State to representation in the Senate in conformity with the Constitution and laws of the United States; and, higher and beyond all this, it is a question of supreme moment to all the people of all the States that this great council of States shall have within its membership those, and only those, who bear credentials of unquestioned authority. To admit others, for personal or partisan reasons, would degrade this body to the level of a political caucus, shake public confidence, bring the Senate into contempt, and inflict a blow upon representative government from which it could not readily recover.

The gravity of the issue is augmented by the further consideration that the framers of the Constitution, wisely or unwisely, left its determination to the Senate itself, from whose judgment, right or wrong, there lies no appeal except to that court of last resort, the sovereign people, in whose hands is lodged the supreme power to make or modify constitutions when in their judgment they become subversive of popular government. The responsibility of determining this question therefore is imposed upon us, which we can neither avoid nor disregard.

By the Federal Constitution "each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members," and I quite agree with the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] that in passing upon this question "the Senate is the body, the court, the judge of the election of Senators," and, knowing the high character of the membership of this body, I am confident no Senator, in his capacity as a judge, will permit himself, as a sworn member of this high court, to be swerved one iota from his convictions of duty under the Constitution by any political or personal considerations, however potent or exacting.

IS NOT A PERSONAL CONTEST.

I confess to some astonishment when the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] the other day appealed to the "friends of Mr. Quay" to come to his assistance, as if this was a personal contest to be decided, not upon high constitutional grounds, but upon the personal likes or dislikes of the individual membership of this body. I confess this has not been my view of the contest, nor my conception of the character of this tribunal, and I acquit the Senator from Colorado of any design to divert the attention of the Senate from the real issue, and attribute his impassioned speech to his generous impulses, which, however commendable and praiseworthy, will, I am sure, not warp his judgment, for, while generous, I know him also to be just.

I have understood and supposed that the only qualifications for a United States Senator were prescribed by the Constitution of the United States, requiring that one should have—attained the age of 30 years, been nine years a citizen of the United States, and an inhabitant of the State from which chosen.

It has not been my understanding that in addition to these qualifications he should possess the friendship of the individual members of the Senate, or that if he possessed these constitutional qualifications the personal likes or dislikes of the individual members of the Senate could in any way be invoked in determining the right to a seat in this body. We are admonished that Mr. Quay has heretofore been a member of the United States Senate, but it has not been my understanding that, in addition to age, citizenship, and inhabitancy of the State, it was also essential that one should have been a member of a previous Senate. Mr. Corbett, of Oregon, it seems, once occupied a seat in this Chamber, and yet it was not contended from that fact that he was entitled to be seated upon the appointment by the governor. I do not find it laid down in the Constitution, as one of the qualifications for admission to this body, that a man should be not only of proper age, citizenship, and a resident of the State, but should also have voted for or against the force bill at some time in the course of his Senatorial career. That has not heretofore been regarded as one of the qualifications of a Senator.

Mr. President, such considerations have no place in this controversy and before this august tribunal. Divested, therefore, of every improper influence, we can approach the consideration of this case with the satisfaction of knowing that whatever the result may be, the judgment rendered will be untainted by suspicion of unworthy motives, and we can rest in the consciousness that we have discharged a great public duty, preserved the rights of the States and the ancient dignity and integrity of the Senate.

THE LANGUAGE EMPLOYED IS CLEAR.

Proceeding, then, to the consideration of the exact issue involved, let me again direct the attention of the Senate to the wording of the constitutional provision in controversy:

If vacancies happen by resignation, or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature, the executive of the State may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies.

The language employed is so clear, simple, and direct, the wonder to my mind is that there should ever have been any contention as to its import. If the rule laid down by Judge Story applicable to the construction of constitutions be applied to this provision, what room can there be for doubt or question as to its true meaning? Judge Story says:

Every word employed in the Constitution is to be expounded in its plain, obvious, and common-sense meaning, unless the context furnishes some ground to control, qualify, or enlarge it. Constitutions are not designed for metaphysical or logical subtleties, for niceties of expression, for critical propriety, for elaborate shades of meaning, or for the exercise of philosophical acuteness or judicial research. They are instruments of a practical nature, founded on the common business of human life, adapted to common wants, designed for common use, and fitted for common understandings. The people make them: the people adopt them; the people must be supposed to read them, with the help of common sense, and can not be presumed to admit in them any recondite meaning or any extraordinary gloss. (I Story, page 322.)

In the light of this rule of construction I confess it is difficult for me to comprehend how any serious difference of opinion could possibly have arisen as to the significance of the words employed; and yet it is a fact that a sharp contention is now made as to the true intent and meaning of the provision in question.

These antagonistic opinions are set forth at length in the report of the committee and the views of the minority submitted in this case, from which the exact points of difference are made to appear. They may be summarized as follows:

On the one hand, it is contended (and this is the view of the majority of the committee) that the vacancy to which the governor can make temporary appointment must be a vacancy, in the language of the Constitution, that "happens during the recess of the legislature," meaning thereby that it must be a vacancy having its beginning, its inception, during the time and when the legislature is not in session; and that a vacancy occurring when the legislature is in session, as was the fact in this case, is not such a vacancy as the governor of the State can supply by temporary appointment; and, further, that the vacancy which the governor can supply must not only "happen during the recess of the legislature," but it must occur, in the language of the Constitution, by "resignation or otherwise"—meaning by "otherwise" some like unforeseen event against which human foresight can not provide.

On the other hand, it is insisted (and this is the contention of the minority) that the expression "happen during the recess" does not mean that the vacancy must actually "happen," or come into existence, have its inception "during the recess," but the true intent and meaning is that if a vacancy "happen" to exist in recess, though it had its inception and beginning when the legislature was in session, yet, upon the adjournment of the legislature, such a vacancy becomes a vacancy "happening during the recess," within the meaning of the Constitution, which the executive of the State can supply by temporary appointment; and that the expression by "resignation or otherwise" embraces all conceivable vacancies from whatever cause, and that therefore it follows whenever the executive finds a vacancy existing for any cause, and the legislature is not in session at the time, he may make temporary appointment to such vacancy until the next meeting of the legislature. I think I have stated accurately the exact issue.

These are the conflicting views held in relation to the provision now under consideration, and which must be passed upon by the Senate.

WHAT THE CENTURY HAS TAUGHT.

We might very properly refrain from entering into an elaborate discussion of these conflicting views as to the meaning of the words "happen" or "otherwise," as used in the provision under controversy, for the reason that however this contention might be settled, whether "happen" means "existing" and "likewise" means "anywise," or "in session" means "during recess," yet, so far as this case is concerned, it is a matter of utter indifference what construction is to be put upon these words if the Senate is to have the slightest regard for its own precedents, as it is the established rule of the Senate, founded upon an unbroken line of decisions—from the foundation of the Government until this hour—that the governor of a State has no authority to make temporary appointment to a vacancy in this body which occurred when the legislature was in session, or, since the Lanman case in 1825, where the legislature had the opportunity to fill the vacancy either before or after the occurrence of the vacancy. This is the established rule, from which there has been no departure, and it is impossible to admit Mr. Quay without reversing the action of the Senate from the hour of its organization. If Mr. Quay is admitted it will be the first time in the history of the Senate of the United States that the right has been accorded the governor of a State to make temporary appointment to a vacancy which happened when the legislature was in session and declined or failed to fill it. If this be true it ought to be decisive of this case and end the controversy.

I am apprehensive, however, that in this instance there may be a disposition to disregard, for some reason, the established doctrine of a century, and in these times of expansion to expand the Constitution so as to embrace the case of Mr. Quay. If this be true, it will justify going back of the rule as established by the precedents and search for the principle upon which it is founded and see what, if any, justification can be found for its abrogation now.

THE CREATION OF THE CONGRESS.

In attempting to arrive at a correct interpretation of the constitutional provisions relating to the election of United States Senators, and the supplying of vacancies which may happen in the representation from any State, it is important to consider the object sought to be attained, in this regard, by the framers of that instrument. To this end it will not be necessary to give a full historical recital of the conflicting views which characterized the deliberations of the Convention, but it is sufficient for our present purpose to observe that the plan finally determined upon comprehended three great departments of government—the executive, legislative, and judicial. A legislative department having been provided for, to be called the Congress, consisting of two branches—a Senate and a House of Representatives—the next step in order was to constitute the necessary machinery by which the membership of these two bodies might be secured. To this end it was provided:

> The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States. * * * The number of Representatives shall not exceed one for every 30,000, but each State shall have at least one Representative.

The membership of the House of Representatives, it will be seen, was to be drawn directly from the body of the people. The people of the State constitute the elective body for the House of Representatives.

The membership of the Senate is provided for and secured by virtue of the following provision of the Constitution:

> The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the legislature thereof for six years.

The legislature of the State, therefore, is the elective body of the Senate, as the people of the State are the elective body of the House of Representatives. By these provisions of the Constitution a perfect machinery was provided and set up, which, in its regular and unimpeded operation, and in the absence of any unforeseen event, would, with perfect regularity, supply the full membership of the two Houses of Congress. But the framers of the Constitution did not stop here. Had they done so, their work would have been manifestly imperfect and incomplete. They understood full well the uncertainty of human life and human action, and that, after the membership of the two Houses had been secured by the process herein provided, some unforeseen event might occur to deprive one or both bodies of the full representation thus secured, and to which they were entitled under the Constitution. A Senator or Member after election might decline the office, die, resign, be expelled, or otherwise vacate the office, in which event it was necessary to provide a method by which such vacancy could be supplied, that the membership of both bodies might always be full. To that end it is provided in the case of the House of Representatives that—

> When vacancies happen in the representation from any State, the executive authority thereof shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies.

By this provision it is within the power of the State to keep its representation in the House at all times full and complete; for, as often as vacancies occur in the membership of the House for any cause, the executive authority of the State is commanded to summon the electorate to fill such vacancy. The framers of the Constitution, therefore, by this provision perfected the machinery for constituting and maintaining a full membership at all times in the House of Representatives. Under this provision the people of Utah have just filled the vacancy from that State in the House.

The framers of the Constitution manifested quite as much desire to make provision for filling vacancies in the House of Representatives as in the Senate. They evidently deemed it quite as important that that body, which holds the power of taxation and expenditures in its hands, should at all times have a full representation. It is more important, indeed, than in the Senate, for if there be but one Senator from a State, he represents the whole State, speaks and votes for it.

But there are some States that have only a single Representative, and if that seat becomes vacant for any cause the State is without representation in the most important branch of Congress. If a seat from the Congressional district becomes vacant for any cause, that district must go wholly unrepresented until the seat is filled. So I submit that it is quite as important that the membership of the House should always be full as that the States should have at all times two Senators in this body, and the framers of the Constitution were just as solicitous to secure that end in the one case as in the other.

SAFEGUARDS WERE AMPLE.

It remained only to provide the same safeguards for filling vacancies which might happen in the membership of the Senate. To that end it is provided, in the same section which prescribes the methods of choosing United States Senators, that—

> If vacancies happen by resignation, or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies.

It will be observed that in supplying vacancies in the Senate a different and more elaborate machinery is provided than that employed for the filling of vacancies in the House. It might have been provided, as in the House, where the executive of the State is required to "issue writs of election to fill vacancies," that, upon the occurrence of a vacancy in the Senate during the recess of the legislature of the State, the executive shall issue his proclamation convening the State legislature—the elective body of the Senate—in extraordinary session for the purpose of filling such vacancy. That would conform to the method prescribed for filling vacancies in the House. But this power is now possessed by the executive of the State and can always be invoked whenever the occasion for its exercise may arise. But it was seen that summoning the State legislature whenever and as often as vacancies might occur in the Senate would be attended with inconvenience to the members of the State legislature and unnecessary expense to the State. The calling together from every part of the State the membership of the State legislature to fill vacancies which might occur when the legislature was not in session was avoided by the provision of the Constitution already cited:

> If vacancies happen by resignation, or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature of the State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies.

It will be observed that the exercise of this power of temporary appointment by the State executive is not mandatory, as in the case of vacancies in the House, but he "may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature." It lies wholly within his discretion. He may convene the legislature, or make temporary appointment until the legislature shall meet in regular or extraordinary session. The reason for leaving the exercise of this power within the discretion of the executive was given by Mr. Ellsworth in the debate in the Constitutional Convention in explanation of this provision, when he said:

> It is only said the executive may supply vacancies. When the legislative meeting happens to be near the power will not be exerted.

For this reason the exercise of the appointive power was purposely made discretionary.

And thus by these various provisions the necessary machinery was provided, not only for the primary selection of the membership of both Houses, but the supplying of vacancies which might happen in such membership—a machinery so perfect and complete that it need only to be employed by those in whose hands it is intrusted to insure, at all times, a full membership of both Houses of Congress.

In the examination of these various provisions it will be observed that the legislature of the State is, under the Constitution, the sole depository of the power to elect United States Senators either for a full term or to fill a vacancy. The executive of a State can not choose Senators nor fill vacancies—this power is lodged exclusively with the State legislature. The executive "may make temporary appointments" under certain circumstances and conditions, but in no case is he authorized to fill either the original term or any vacancy which may happen therein. That power is lodged exclusively with the legislature. This will be conceded.

LIMITED POWER OF EXECUTIVE.

When, therefore, Senator Quay's term expired on the 4th of March, 1899, it was the right and the duty of the legislature of the State of Pennsylvania, then in session, to choose his successor for the full term of six years. This was the express mandate of the Constitution, and, as Webster said in the constitutional convention of Massachusetts in 1820:

Whatsoever is enjoined on the legislature of the State by the Constitution of the United States the legislature is bound to perform.

Not only this, but by the act of Congress passed in 1866 it is provided that—

The legislature of each State which is chosen next preceding the expiration of the term for which any Senator was elected to represent such State in Congress shall, on the second Tuesday after the meeting and organization thereof, proceed to elect a Senator in Congress.

The legislature of Pennsylvania, therefore, in session on the 4th of March, 1899, at the time the vacancy occurred in this case, was, in the language of the act of 1866, the legislature "chosen next preceding the expiration of the term for which" Senator Quay was elected. This particular legislature, therefore, in session on the 4th of March, 1899, and remaining in continuous session until the 20th of April, 1899, was resting under the double mandate of the Constitution and the law to elect a Senator for the full term of six years, and, as I said before, no other power was authorized to perform this duty. It failed to discharge that constitutional and legal obligation, and on the 20th day of April, 1899, adjourned without day, leaving the office of United States Senator vacant. It is the vacancy thus created which the governor of the State of Pennsylvania attempts to supply by a temporary appointment, invoking as his authority the constitutional provision already cited.

This is the storm center around which the entire controversy rages. To this point, therefore, I direct the attention of the Senate.

That the executive of a State has the power, under certain circumstances and conditions, to make temporary appointments of United States Senators is not denied, but the extent of such power is the only matter in controversy. The executive is empowered to make temporary appointments under certain restrictions and limitations, clearly set forth and defined. He has no authority, however, to supply all vacancies unless the construction contended for by the minority shall prevail. That power was expressly withheld by the Convention that framed the Constitution.

It may be well at this point to glance at the proceedings of the Convention to determine, if possible, the true intent and meaning of this provision, and what the framers of the Constitution designed to do and did do in relation to supplying vacancies. Nothing further was necessary to perfect the machinery for the election of Senators—it only remained to provide for the contingency of vacancies.

WHAT THE CONVENTION ACTUALLY DID.

It will be well, therefore, to trace, and I will do it briefly, the plan for creating the Senate and for supplying vacancies therein. There were twenty-four resolutions agreed to in the Convention expressive of the general plan of government. Three of these resolutions—the fourth, the eleventh, and the twenty-second—relate to the organization of the Senate. These general resolutions were referred to the committee on detail.

When the committee on detail made its report to the Convention, the Convention modified the report in many particulars, and after such modification of the report of the committee on detail it was referred to the committee on style. After the committee on style reported, the Convention itself modified the report of that committee, and as thus modified it was embodied in the Constitution.

DEVELOPMENT OF PROVISION TOUCHING VACANCIES.

And at this point, for the convenience of the argument, I present in order the steps taken in perfecting the provision in relation to the Senate and vacancies therein:

First. The resolutions of the Convention, as agreed to and referred to committee on detail.

Second. Report of committee on detail.

Third. Modification by the Convention of the report of the committee on detail and as referred to committee on style.

Fourth. Report of committee on style.

Fifth. Modification of report of committee on style, as finally embodied in Constitution.

"4. Resolved, That the members of the second branch of the Legislature of the United States ought to be chosen by the individual legislatures; to be of the age of thirty years at least; to hold their offices for six years, one-third to go out biennially. * * *"

(1) Resolutions agreed to by Convention and referred to Committee on Detail.

"11. Resolved, That in the second branch of the Legislature of the United States each State shall have an equal vote."

"22. Resolved, That the representation in the second branch of the Legislature of the United States shall consist of two members from each State, who shall vote per capita."

Vacancies may be supplied by the executive until the next meeting of the legislature.

(2) Report of the Committee on Detail.

Vacancies happening by refusals to accept, resignations, or otherwise, may be supplied by the legislature of the State in the representation of which such vacancies shall happen, or by the executive thereof until the next meeting of the legislature.

(3) Modifications by Convention of report of the Committee on Detail, and as thus modified referred to Committee on Style.

And if vacancies happen by resignation, or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature.

(4) Report of the Committee on Style.

And if vacancies happen by resignation, or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies.

(5) Report of Committee on Style as modified by Convention and inserted in the Constitution.

It would be well, therefore, as I say, to trace the plan for creating the Senate and supplying vacancies therein, from its inception to its completed form, as it was finally agreed to and embodied in the Constitution as it stands to-day.

The subject came up in Convention in committee of the whole, and all the various plans and suggestions were considered as to the manner of electing Senators, their term of service, qualifications, etc. The committee of the whole finally reported to the Convention, as the result of its deliberations, a series of resolutions, the following of which related to the constitution of the Senate:

Resolved, That the members of the second branch of the national legislature ought to be chosen by the individual legislatures; to be of the age of 30 years, at least; to hold their office for a term sufficient to insure their independence, namely, seven years.

When this resolution came up in the Convention for consideration a great contention arose, among other things, over the basis of representation, the smaller States refusing to agree to any plan which did not give them equal voice in the Senate. This brought the Convention, as Sherman said, to a "full stop," requiring the efforts of a subcommittee of one from each State to adjust differences and harmonize conflicting views, and the final upshot of the matter was that the Convention agreed to twenty-three propositions as embodying its views on the fundamental principles of the government to be established, three of which related to the Senate, as follows:

Fourth. That the members of the second branch of the legislature of the United States ought to be chosen by the individual legislatures; to be of the age of 30 years, at least; to hold their offices for six years, one-third to go out biennially.

Eleventh. That in the second branch of the legislature of the United States each State shall have an equal vote.

Twenty-second. That the representation in the second branch of the legislature of the United States shall consist of two members from each State, who shall vote per capita.

These twenty-three resolves of the Convention above mentioned were then referred to the "committee of detail," to work out and formulate and express in proper phase the ideas embodied therein. It will be remembered that there was also referred to this committee, in connection with these resolutions, Mr. Pinckney's draft of a federal government, presumably for such helpful suggestion as it might contain and in which for the first time, so far as I have been able to discover, the idea of supplying vacancies appears.

The Congress, by Pinckney's plan, was to consist of a house of delegates and a senate, and it was provided by this plan that—vacancies in the house of delegates were to be supplied by the executive authority of the State in which they shall happen.

The senate was to be chosen by the house of delegates and—

The house of delegates shall fill all vacancies that arise from death or resignation for the time of service remaining of the member so dying or resigning.

By referring the Pinckney plan, which contained a method for supplying vacancies, to the committee of detail, this question was also before the committee, although up to that time the Convention had expressed no opinion upon that subject.

THREE SETTLED PRINCIPLES DETERMINED UPON.

There went to the committee of detail, therefore, three settled principles in the organization of the Senate which the Convention had determined:

First. That the Senators should be chosen by the legislatures.

Second. That there should be equal representation, and to that end there should be two Senators from each State, voting per capita.

Third. A suggestion in the Pinckney plan as to the method of filling vacancies.

The committee of detail, to which was referred the three resolves above mentioned and the Pinckney plan, reported back the following provision:

The Senate of the United States shall be chosen by the legislatures of the several States. Each legislature shall choose two members. Vacancies may be supplied by the executive until the next meeting of the legislature. Each member shall have one vote.

I have restricted quotations to the question of vacancies, as that is the only question in controversy.

It will be observed that this report conformed exactly to the views of the Convention, as expressed in the resolutions referred to the committee of detail. It provided for the election of Senators by the legislatures, two from each State, thus securing equality of representation and gave to each Senator one vote. In addition to this the committee made provision for filling vacancies, and it is worthy of note that the expression in the report "vacancies may be supplied by the executive until the next meeting of the legislature" conformed, almost word for word, to the provision in the Pinckney plan for filling vacancies in the house of delegates, which was as follows:

Vacancies therein shall be supplied by the executive authority of the State.

This was the first time the supplying of vacancies had been mentioned.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PETTUS in the chair). Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. BURROWS. I do.

Mr. CHANDLER. Does not the majority report, in which the Senator from Michigan concurred, admit that the clause as reported by the committee on detail would warrant the appointment of Senator Quay by the governor at this time?

Mr. BURROWS. Quite likely; but the Senator is in error in saying that I concurred in the report. I did concur in the conclusion to which the committee arrived, but not in all its reasons.

Mr. CHANDLER. Then I ask the Senator to allow me to call attention to a fact in this connection.

Mr. BURROWS. Very well.

Mr. CHANDLER. The majority of the committee, in the report made by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. TURLEY] who is now in the Senate, admits that under the report of the committee on detail and under the modifications made by the committee on style, the governor had the right to appoint. I wish to ask the Senator a question; I made that statement for the purpose of asking a question; I would not interrupt him except for that purpose. It is whether he finds anything in the Constitutional Convention which indicates that the committee on style, in their report, intended to change what the majority of the committee admit was the meaning of that clause as originally proposed.

Mr. BURROWS. So far as concerns the report of the majority of the committee and what the Senator from Tennessee may have said, we have a right to differ. I should say that the original provision, that "vacancies may be supplied by the executive until the next meeting of the legislature," clearly indicates that the governor could not appoint except in recess.

Mr. CHANDLER. Then the Senator controverts that admission of the report of the committee?

Mr. BURROWS. It is a matter of difference of opinion. I think it will appear as I go on that the purpose of the Convention was to limit the power of the governor to appoint simply to vacancies which occurred when the legislature was in recess.

Under this provision, as reported from the committee of detail, the power of the executive to supply vacancies was expressly limited "until the next meeting of the legislature," the purpose being manifestly to permit the executive to act only in the absence of the legislature. When the legislature, the primary power clothed with authority to elect Senators, should meet, then the power of the executive to supply vacancies ceased. That is clear. He was only authorized to supply vacancies during the absence of the legislature. So soon as the legislature should meet and have the opportunity to fill, the power of the executive to supply terminated. For this reason it follows if the legislature was in session when the vacancy occurred it was not within the competency of the executive to supply such vacancy. If the meeting of the legislature arrests and supersedes the power of the executive to make temporary appointment, then the existence of a legislature at the time the vacancy occurs must for the same reason prevent the exercise of such power.

INTENT WAS TO RESTRICT EXECUTIVE POWER.

I submit, therefore, that under the provision as reported from the committee of detail, the clear intent was to restrict the power of the executive to supply to those vacancies which should occur when the legislature was not in session. Nothing was said, however, in this report as to the cause of vacancy, and had this provision stood, as reported from the committee of detail, it is quite possible that the executive might have supplied a vacancy occasioned by the expiration of a term, if the legislature was not in session at the time the vacancy occurred. At least this would have been a debatable question, and it will be seen how the Convention subsequently cleared this matter up and made it certain by specifying the vacancies, both as to character and time of occurrence, which the executive would be permitted to supply.

When the report of the committee of detail came up for consideration in the Convention, objection was at once made to the supplying of vacancies by the executive as conferring upon that officer a too liberal grant of power, as shown by the following debate:

Mr. WILSON objected to vacancies in the Senate being supplied by the executives of the States. It was unnecessary, as the legislature will meet so frequently.

Mr. RANDOLPH thought it necessary, in order to prevent inconvenient chasms in the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Senators may resign or not accept. This provision, therefore, is absolutely necessary.

Mr. Madison, in order to prevent doubts whether resignation could be made by Senators or whether they could refuse to accept, moved to strike out the words after "vacancies" and insert the words—happening by refusals to accept, resignations, or otherwise, may be supplied by the legislature of the State in the representation of which such vacancies shall happen, or by the executive thereof until the next meeting of the legislature.

Now note what they did. Instead of "vacancies may be supplied by the executive until the next meeting of the legislature," the Convention changed that and said "vacancies may be supplied by the legislature or by the executive until the next meeting of the legislature."

So that that clause of the Constitution read:

Vacancies happening by refusals to accept, resignations, or otherwise, may be supplied by the legislature of the State in the representation of which such vacancies shall happen, or by the executive thereof until the next meeting of the legislature.

What does that mean but that if the legislature is present it shall fill the vacancy, and the governor can not act in such a case?

Gouverneur Morris, in support of Madison, said:

This is absolutely necessary; otherwise, as members chosen into the Senate are disqualified from being appointed to any office by section 9 of this article, it will be in the power of a legislature, by appointing a man against his consent, to deprive the United States of his services.

In lieu, therefore, of the provision, as reported by the committee of detail, that "vacancies may be supplied by the executive until the next meeting of the legislature," the report was modified by the Convention to conform to the suggestions made, so that it read: "Vacancies happening by refusals to accept, resignations, or otherwise, may be supplied by the legislature of the State in the representation of which such vacancies shall happen, or by the executive thereof until the next meeting of the legislature." Instead, therefore, of unbridled power being conferred upon the executive to fill vacancies arising from whatever cause, his power was thus still further curbed and restricted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PETTUS in the chair). The Senator from Michigan will pause a moment. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the unfinished business is laid before the Senate, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 2355) in relation to the suppression of insurrection in, and to the government of, the Philippine Islands, ceded by Spain to the United States by the treaty concluded at Paris on the 10th day of December, 1898.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may go over until after the Senator from Michigan has finished his remarks.

Mr. BURROWS. I am obliged to the Senator from New Hampshire.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that order will be made.

THE STEPS WERE CAREFULLY TAKEN.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. President, the Convention defined and specified the kind of vacancies the executive might supply by saying: "Vacancies happening by refusals to accept, resignations, or otherwise," may be supplied, etc. Vacancies, therefore, happening in a certain way might be supplied by the executive, and the ways specified clearly imply that the legislature had performed its duty by electing a Senator. He may supply vacancies happening by "refusals to accept." Refusals to accept what? Clearly the office of Senator to which he had been elected by the legislature. He might supply vacancies happening "by resignation." Resignation of what? The office of Senator to which he had been elected. If it does not mean that it does not mean anything, and it excludes the idea of executive appointment at the beginning of a term.

A vacancy happening by the expiration of a term, as in this case, confessedly is not a vacancy caused by "refusal to accept" or "by resignation," but solely by the failure of the legislature to act, and therefore not within the competency of the executive to supply, unless such a vacancy is embraced within the meaning of the word "otherwise." Of this I will have something to say later on. I will observe in passing, however, that independent of the known rule of construction, that a word of general import is controlled and limited by the specific word with which it is associated, it is a little remarkable that at no time and nowhere in the proceedings of the Convention was there the remotest suggestion by any member of that Convention that the legislature might fail to do its duty, and that it was intended to confer upon the executive the power of appointment in such a contingency.

Neither Madison nor anyone else ever suggested filling such a vacancy. They suggested death, removal, expulsion, resignation, but never the failure of the legislature to do its duty. If that had been the purpose, how easy it would have been to have said "if vacancies happen by failure of the legislature to elect, by resignation, or otherwise." They surely would not have left so vast and far-reaching power to be inferred from the word "otherwise" as used in that connection.

Mr. STEWART. I call the attention of the Senator from Michigan——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada is out of order.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President——

Mr. BURROWS. I ask the Senator from Nevada to excuse me.

Mr. STEWART. I do not want to make a speech, but I wish to call the Senator's attention to a fact.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada is out of order.

Mr. BURROWS. I will ask the Senator from Nevada not to interrupt me, as my speech is altogether too long, and I wish to proceed.

It would seem much more reasonable to suppose that, when Madison suggested a doubt as to whether Senators could resign or refuse to accept, these words were inserted for the purpose of removing that doubt, and then instead of inserting, as in the Pinckney plan, the word "death," etc., and enumerating all the other casualties which might happen to an incumbent of the office, they were all embraced in the word "otherwise." And it will be observed that every suggestion of vacancy by the Convention, by speech or amendment, had reference to something happening to the incumbent of the office and not to dereliction of duty on the part of the legislature. It is hardly to be presumed that the framers of the Constitution intended to embrace within the meaning of that word a failure of the legislature to perform its duty, for that would have been to admit in the beginning a fatal defect in their plan of government.

More than this, as Senator Vance well said in the Mantle case:

> Can the Senator point out any case in the Constitution where, a duty being primarily imposed upon an officer therein named, the performance of that duty is conferred upon another officer contingent upon the failure of the first officer to perform his duty?

And Senator Garland, the ex-Attorney-General of the United States, said in the debate in 1879:

> It is a well established principle of jurisprudence that when one tribunal has jurisdiction and fails to exercise it, no other tribunal can assume it.

It will be observed that the Convention still further modified the report of the committee of detail, which, it will be remembered, provided that—> vacancies may be supplied by the executive until the next meeting of the legislature, by adding—

> or by the legislature of the State, et cetera, so that the provision as a whole was made to read as follows:

> Vacancies happening by refusals to accept, resignation, or otherwise, may be supplied by the legislature of the State in the representation of which such vacancies shall happen, or by the executive thereof until the next meeting of the legislature.

By this it will be seen that the Convention, instead of conferring the power of supplying vacancies exclusively upon the executive, vested it primarily in the legislature, so jealous were they of executive control over the matter of choosing Senators. The authority of the executive was secondary. They were evidently determined that the executive should not be permitted to take the selection of Senators either for a full term or to fill a vacancy away from the legislature, where the primary power had been deposited. The manifest purpose in this modification was to make it incumbent upon the legislature, in the first instance, to fill the vacancy, but if the legislature was not in session or for any cause could not act, then the vacancy was to be supplied "by the executive until the next meeting of the legislature"—until the legislature, the primary power, could act. In this form, as thus modified by the Convention, it was referred to the committee on style, which reported it back to the Convention in the following form: > during the recess of the legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature.

> And if vacancies happen, by resignation or otherwise, "during the recess of the legislature of any State"—

This is the first time that clause appears—

It is conceded that the committee on style was only authorized to put in proper form and phrase that to which the Convention had already agreed. Now note what the committee did. First, they dropped the words "refusals to accept" as evidently being surplusage, being included within the meaning of the word "otherwise." They had evidently abandoned the suggestion of Madison, that it was necessary to include these words in order to confer upon a Senator the right of "refusal to accept." Secondly, they dropped the words—> by the legislature of the States in the representation of which such vacancies shall happen—evidently for the reason that the legislature, if in session or if convened, had the power to fill vacancies under its original grant of power to elect Senators, and this provision was, therefore, unnecessary, and inserted in lieu thereof the words—

> during the recess of the legislature of any State—

thus still further limiting the power of the governor over vacancies to those which should happen when the legislature was not in session—when the primary power was absent and could not act; so that the provision as formulated by the committee on style read:

> And if vacancies happen by resignation, or otherwise, during the recessof the legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature.

WORDS WERE CAREFULLY CHOSEN.

It is worthy of note, too, in this connection that the committee on style dropped the words "may be supplied" and inserted, for the first time, the words "may make temporary appointment." Why was this done? "Supply" is defined to mean "to fill up," but it is clear the Convention never intended to allow the governor to fill the vacancy; and so these words were stricken out and "may make temporary appointment" inserted, "temporary" meaning, as defined by lexicographers, "lasting for a time only; existing or continuing for a limited time; not permanent." From this it will be seen how guarded the Convention was in conferring this power of appointment upon the executive of the State, and how determined they were to restrict it within the narrowest possible limits. Not content with this, when the Convention took up the report of the committee on style, to compare it with the articles agreed to and referred to that committee, they modified the provision as reported from the committee on style by adding after "legislature" the words "which shall then fill such vacancies," as if to set definite bounds to the exercise of this limited power, beyond which the executive could not go, and, as thus modified, it was embodied in the final draft of the Constitution.

Now, it has been said that the clause, "which shall then fill such vacancies," refers to those vacancies to which the governor might make temporary appointments; and if the governor can not make a temporary appointment in this case, then the legislature can not fill. The expression "shall fill such vacancy" does not refer to such vacancies as the governor may supply, but to the original vacancy. Our friends on the other side insist upon reading into the Constitution power to supply vacancias, which the executive does not possess, and then draw the conclusion if the governor has not the power to supply then the legislature can not fill.

This is a correct history, step by step, of the development of this provision from its inception to its final completion and embodiment in the Constitution, where it stands to-day in clear and unmistakable phrase:

> If vacancies happen by resignation, or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies.

And thus by apt and appropriate words was carried out the original suggestion: that "vacancies shall be supplied by the executive," so modified, however, as to limit his power of appointment to those cases of vacancy which shall happen "by resignation, or otherwise," and "during the recess of the legislature;" and then set definite bounds to the exercise of this meager authority "until the next meeting of the legislature." Could any language be more explicit and comprehensive or better adapted to convey to the common understanding the purpose sought to be attained?

It seems to me that one cannot follow these proceedings of the Convention in detail without being impressed with the conviction that the only purpose the Convention had in view, in making provision for supplying vacancies, was to provide a method by which casual vacancies happening in a term, and when the legislature was not in session, might be temporarily supplied by the executive of the State until the legislature, the primary power, could have the opportunity to fill such vacancy. The modification of the original broad suggestion that "vacancies may be supplied by the executive until the next meeting of the legislature," so as to restrict the power of appointment to vacancies "happening during the recess" by "resignation, or otherwise," and then only to be exercised "until the next meeting of the legislature," indicates a purpose to circumscribe the power of the executive within the narrowest possible limit, and yet secure the end sought to be attained.

What are the express conditions, then, which must preexist before the executive of the State can exercise the power of temporary appointment?

First. A vacancy must happen;

Second. It must happen during a recess; and Third. It must happen by resignation, or otherwise.

Only when these three things concur and coexist can the executive of a State exercise the power of temporary appointment.

This, I suppose, will be conceded, and I respectfully submit that not one of these conditions, in the plain reading of the Constitution, existed when the governor of Pennsylvania sought to commission Mr. Quay a Senator from that State. The vacancy that occurred on the 4th day of March, 1899, by the expiration of Senator Quay's term, was not a vacancy that "happened" within the meaning of the Constitution; nor was the vacancy occurring on that date, and when the legislature was in session, a vacancy happening "during the recess" of the legislature; nor was the vacancy which occurred on the 4th of March, by reason of the expiration of a previous term, a vacancy "happening by resignation, or otherwise," within the meaning of the Constitution.

Without going into an elaborate discussion of the meaning of the word "happen," as used in this connection, I prefer to direct the attention of the Senate to that which I consider vital and decisive of the question, and that is this—that the vacancy to which the executive is permitted to make temporary appointment must happen "during the recess of the legislature"—when the legislature is not in session. This is as clear as the English language can make it. The reason for this restriction is manifest. If the legislature is in session when the vacancy occurs, there is no occasion for the exercise of executive power, for it is the right and duty of the legislature to fill such vacancy, and no other body or person is clothed with such authority.

"DURING THE RECESS" A FIXED PERIOD.

No governor has yet attempted to take the matter of selecting Senators out of the hands of the legislature and make temporary appointment to a vacancy when the legislature was in actual session. It will be a mere matter of time, however, if this refinement of construction continues, when the executive of a State will usurp the functions of the legislature and make appointments even when the legislature is in session. He can now, in the plain language of the Constitution, appoint only to vacancies which "happen during the recess of the legislature."

There can not possibly be any controversy as to the meaning of the words "during the recess." That is a fixed, definite period of time—from the day the legislature adjourns to the day of its reassembling; and the vacancy which the executive of the State is authorized to supply must "happen" during and within that period.

Every lexicographer defines "during" as "in the time of," as "during life," "during the space of a year," and therefore the expression "happening during the recess," taken in its plain, obvious, and common-sense meaning, is susceptible of but one fair construction, and that is that the vacancy "happened," took place, began to be in the period of time covered by the recess. Webster defines "happen" as "to come by chance," "to come without previous notice," "to take place," "to occur." The expression, therefore, "happening during the recess," to the "common understanding"—in the words of Judge Story—means a vacancy which comes by chance, without previous notice, and within the space of time measured by the recess of the legislature. If this be the proper construction of this provision, then there is no shadow of constitutional authority for the appointment of Mr. Quay.

Under the admitted facts in this case—for it is conceded and it is a matter about which there can not be the slightest controversy, that the vacancy in this case occurred when the legislature was in actual session and fully organized—the legislature was in session on that day and remained in session for forty-seven days thereafter with this vacancy continuing and unprovided for. The Constitution of the United States restricts and limits in express terms the power of the State executive to make temporary appointments of Senators to those cases of vacancy which "happen during the recess." The governor has no authority to make temporary appointment to a vacancy which occurs, as in this case, while the legislature is in session, and which they fail or decline to fill. This has been repeatedly declared.

THE GOVERNOR OF A STATE HAS NO POWER TO MAKE TEMPORARY APPOINTMENT TO A VACANCY WHICH HAPPENS WHEN THE LEGISLATURE IS IN SESSION.

Now, Mr. President, upon this question I desire to cite the opinions of some eminent statesmen. Senator Kernan, of New York (and I commend this to the Senators from New York who are present), in the debate in 1879, gave a correct construction of this provision when he said:

> The vacancies which the governor can fill temporarily by appointment must occur during the recess of the legislature. If the vacancy occurs when the legislature is in session, although it is the last day of the session, the governor can not appoint. It is conceded that such a vacancy must occur during the recess. * * * If the legislature is in session when the vacancy occurs and fails to choose a Senator, the governor can never appoint a person to fill the vacancy.

Senator Kernan was a lawyer, and, as I understand, a constitutional lawyer, whatever that designation may mean.

Senator Edmunds, in the Blair case, who agreed upon some of the general propositions of the minority in this case, said—mark his language:

> Whenever that office—

Referring to the office of Senator—> comes to be vacant, so that the State is deprived of its voice, then, if there be not a State legislature present and in session to fill it, the governor may fill it until the next session of the legislature has an opportunity to do it, and it does not give the governor power to fill it any longer.

"If there be not a State legislature present and in session to fill it," is the language of that distinguished Senator. Senator Edmunds is regarded, or was when a member of the Senate, an authority on the Constitution. He is none the less an authority to-day.

Senator Bailey, in the Bell case, said:

> In such case the legislature, if sitting—

Mark it—

> The legislature, if sitting, should fill the remainder of the term. * * * It seems to have been manifestly the intention and purpose of the framers of the Constitution in adopting this section of the first article not only to confer upon the legislature of a State the right, but to make it a duty, upon the expiration of a Senator's term, to choose for him a successor, and, further, to provide that after one shall be thus chosen, if, by resignation, by the accident of death, or otherwise, there should be a vacancy in the term for which a choice had thus been made, to confer upon the executive, if the vacancy occurred during the recess of the legislature, the right to make a temporary appointment until the next meeting of the legislature.

Mr. Cameron, of Wisconsin, remembered by many Senators here as an able lawyer, said:

> The Senator, I think, ought to state that a session of the legislature of Vermont had been held intermediate the occurring of the vacancy and the attempt to fill it, and all the authorities hold that where there is a session of the legislature intermediate the occurring of the vacancy and the time that the executive attempts to fill it, that prevents the filling of the vacancy by the executive. The reason, of course, is because the Constitution expressly provides that it shall be so.

Mr. Carpenter, of Wisconsin, than whom no more able lawyer ever occupied a seat in this Chamber, said:

> But it is clear that to authorize the governor to make an appointment there must have been a recess of the body which at that time possessed the legislative power of that State; because the governor, in making such appointment, acts only for the legislature, which, if in session, could make the election to fill the term.

The minority report in the Phelps case, which was adopted by the Senate, says, among other things:

> The Senate of the United States is composed of organized constituencies—the State legislatures. To them belong the power primarily of electing their Senators, when they are in session at the happening of the vacancy, and at their first meeting when it happens in their recess.

I desire also to quote a no less distinguished authority than the senior Senator from Massachusetts himself [Mr. HOAR], who in the great debate in 1879—the Blair case—declared that the governor of a State had no authority to make appointment to a vacancy which occurs while the legislature is in session, even after the legislature should adjourn without filling the vacancy—a case precisely like the one before us.

I am aware the Senator from Massachusetts subsequently modified his views in this regard, yet the reasons he assigned for his opinion then were so cogent that I am sure they will impress the Senate at this time:

> Now, there is scarcely a question—

Said the Senator—

> which can arise under our Constitution in regard to which the authorities are so concurrent or of such weight. There are ten precedents of the Senate itself, beginning with the case which occurred in the year 1797, when many of the framers of the Constitution were in the Senate; and they all concur in holding that the governor may appoint if the vacancy happen by reason that the constitutional term of a Senator had ended—> when the legislature was NOT in session and the legislature has made no provision to fill it.

> Therefore I think we are warranted in saying that the unbroken current of Senatorial precedent, from the beginning of the Government until to-day, is that the governor is entitled to fill a vacancy whenever it happens, whether at the beginning or at the end of the term, so that it happen when the legislature is not in session, until the next meeting of the legislature, when the right of the governor in the premises is determined.

Senator Carpenter at this point interrupted the Senator from Massachusetts with this question:

Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. CARPENTER. I do it for information. I want to vote with the Senator, if I can, on this question. The difficulty in my mind is that I think the emphatic word in the constitutional provision is "happen." Take the case of Wisconsin.

And he states a case precisely like the one now before the Senate:

Our legislature assembles on the first Monday of January. It has to elect to fill up the vacancy that is to occur in March. The legislature generally sits until about the last of April. Suppose they begin on the day fixed by the act of Congress to ballot for Senator; they make no choice; they ballot up to and past the 4th of March without making an election. A vacancy then occurs; by the Constitution the term expires, and the legislature sits still, with that vacancy running on, balloting for thirty days and unable to make a choice, and finally adjourns without making a choice. Could the governor then—appoint a Senator upon the ground that that was a vacancy happening in the recess of the legislature?

That is this case precisely.

Mr. HOAR. I think not; and for the reason not that it would not be a vacancy, but that the power is qualified by the other words, as uniformly construed, that the governor may appoint "until the next meeting of the legislature." Therefore, if the legislature should meet after the vacancy occurred, the governor not having appointed, and fail to elect, the literal answer would be that in the particular case the Senator supposes the vacancy would not have happened in the recess; but I suppose the Senator could easily vary that by supposing the legislature not to be in session on a particular day, and therefore I make the other answer, which is that the governor's right to appoint until the next meeting of the legislature is uniformly construed to mean that after the legislature has met the entire constitutional authority of the governor, so far as relates to that vacancy, is gone.

If the legislature is in session when the vacancy occurs, Senator HOAR answered Senator Carpenter correctly, that the governor had no power to fill it, because the only object of appointing temporarily is to bridge over the time until there can be a legislature assembled, and if the legislature is in session when the vacancy occurs, there is no occasion for making the appointment.

Could anything be more forceful and convincing?

The governor's right to appoint—

In the language of the Senator—until the next meeting of the legislature is uniformly construed to mean that after the legislature has met the entire constitutional authority of the governor, so far as relates to that vacancy, is gone.

NO CHASM EXISTED.

If the power is gone upon the meeting of the legislature, how can the power come into existence if the legislature is in session when the vacancy happens? The Senator then made it very clear that "the power of the executive was only to be exercised until the next meeting of the legislature, in order to prevent," in the language of Randolph, "inconvenient chasms;" but if the legislature is in session when the vacancy takes place, there is no chasm for the executive to bridge, for the primary power to fill the vacancy is present and authorized to act, and the next meeting of the legislature is found in the legislature then existing at the time the vacancy occurred. The legislature being in session when the vacancy takes place, there is no necessity or opportunity for the exercise of executive authority to make temporary appointment.

And so, Mr. President, in the midst of all the perplexing problems of the hour, we are brought face to face with a proposition advocated by the minority of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, which if sustained by the approving judgment of the Senate, will not only reverse its established and time-honored precedents, repudiate the best thought of the century on the subject, but completely revolutionize the whole method of supplying the membership of this body.

Instead of conforming to, what seems to me, the plain mandates of the Constitution, so long obeyed and respected, restricting the right of the governor to make temporary appointments to such "vacancies as may happen by resignation, or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature," and then to be exercised only "until the next meeting of the legislature," it is proposed to declare that the executive has the right to fill the seats in this Chamber made vacant for any cause and at any time, occurring in session or in recess, and for an indefinite period, provided only that the legislature is not in actual session at the time of executive action.

The whole contention of the minority resolves itself into this—the executive may fill any vacancy he finds existing when the legislature is in recess. A vacancy and the absence of the legislature are the only prerequisites for executive action. The framers of the Constitution when they said, "If vacancies happen by resignation, or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature of any State the executive thereof may make temporary appointment until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancy," intended only to say the executive of the State may fill all vacancies when the legislature is not in session.

If at the expiration of a term, though the legislature may be in session at that time, and remain in session many weeks thereafter, yet if it finally adjourn without making a choice of Senator, immediately upon such adjournment the governor may appoint until the next meeting of the legislature, which is construed to mean not only to the meeting of the legislature, but to its final adjournment if no choice is made. If at the next meeting of the legislature thereafter there should again be no choice, immediately upon its adjournment the governor may again appoint until the next meeting of the legislature, and so continue the process indefinitely until some legislature shall make a choice of a Senator, so that seats in this Chamber are to be filled by governors so long and as often as the legislature shall refuse or fail to elect.

In this very case, as an illustration, in the approaching election in Pennsylvania, only about six months distant, if ex-Senator Quay should be a candidate for reelection it will not be necessary for him to carry a majority of the legislature, but only to secure a sufficient number of adherents to prevent an election and force an adjournment, when Governor Stone can again disregard the mandates of his own constitution, refuse to call a session of the legislature, and again issue his commission to Senator Quay to hold a seat in this body until the next meeting of the legislature, and then, upon the theory of the minority, he would be seated, and thus repeat the process for the full term of six years, and thus continue to hold a seat in this body by the favoritism of the governor, and independent of the will of the legislature of the State of Pennsylvania. Is the Senate of the United States prepared to indorse a construction which would lead to such results?

WHERE WOULD THE PROCESS END?

This same contention leads to the conclusion that if the original States, through their legislatures, had refused or neglected for any reason to elect Senators in the beginning, to set the machinery of government in motion, the executives of the several States could have appointed Senators until the legislature should elect, and if the legislature never elected, these seats could have been filled by governors from that time until the present hour. The framers of the Constitution evidently lost sight for the moment of this remarkable power lodged in the executive of a State to appoint Senators in the absence of legislative action, when its committee on detail, in suggesting when and how the National Government should be set in motion, suggested that—

Congress should appoint and publish a day for commencing proceedings under this Constitution; and that after such publication the legislatures of the several States should elect members of the Senate.

Strange they should have failed to have added, "or the governor appoint." If it be true he possessed such power, evidently the fathers had not discovered it.

Under the construction of the minority upon the admission of a new State into the Union, if the legislature should neglect or refuse to elect Senators, why can not the executive of the State appoint Senators until some legislature shall elect? This doctrine, it seems to me, and indeed it has been repeatedly asserted, leads inevitably to this conclusion. If this doctrine is to be put into practical operation, while possibly it may keep the Senate always full, in the language of the Senator from Massachusetts, yet you may be sure it will also keep the States always full of discord, dissension, and dangerous factions, break up parties, overthrow majorities, and surely end in revolt and revolution. And in this connection I can not refrain from again quoting the words of Hamilton, in the Federalist (page 393), where he says in explanation of this provision of the Constitution:

It may be alleged that, by declining the appointment of Senators, they—might at any time give a fatal blow to the Union. It is certainly true that the State legislatures, by forbearing the appointment of Senators, may destroy the National Government. So far as that construction may expose the Union to the possibility of injury from the State legislatures, it is an evil, but it is an evil which could not have been avoided without excluding the States in their political capacities wholly from a place in the organization of the National Government.

But how could the State legislatures, if the contention of the minority be sound, by forbearing the appointment of Senators, destroy the National Government? The executive can appoint whenever and as often as the legislature fails to elect. How it would have quieted the apprehension of Alexander Hamilton for the safety of the National Government if he could have but known that the governors of the States had the power to keep the Senate always full, though the legislatures should fail to do so. He was evidently laboring under the delusion that if the legislatures failed to elect there was no remedy, and the whole fabric of government would be placed in jeopardy. How natural it would have been for Hamilton, in his defense of this provision of the Constitution, if such a defense were permissible, in answer to the criticism that the States, by withholding Senators, might break up the National Government, to have said in reply what is contended for now by the minority, that if the legislature fails to elect at any time the Constitution empowers the executive of the State to appoint Senators, and so keep the Senate always full. It seems inexplicable that Hamilton, a member of the Convention that framed the Constitution, should have lost sight of this power of the governor to supplement the failure of the legislature.

THE MODERN DOCTRINE AND THE FATHERS.

If the great Marshall, as Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, could only have conceived and comprehended this modern doctrine, could he have but discovered the latent power of State executives to keep the Senate always full in spite of legislatures, he never would have given utterance to the declaration found in his opinion in the case of Cohens vs. The State of Virginia, reported in the 6th of Wheaton at page 390, where the learned justice said:

It is true, that if all the States, or a majority of them, refuse to elect Senators, the legislative power of the Union will be suspended. But if any one State refuse to elect them, the Senate will not, on that account, be the less capable of performing all its functions.

It will be observed in this last suggestion of the Chief Justice that he was of the opinion that the Senate could perform all its functions even if it was not full.

Had Marshall known and comprehended this modern doctrine, that governors of States could appoint Senators whenever and as often as State legislatures failed to elect, his great mind would have been relieved of the apprehension that—

The legislative power of the Union might be suspended by the refusal or failure of the legislatures to elect Senators—and he would have rested with composure in the reflection that the functions of the Senate could not be suspended or destroyed so long as there were State executives in being empowered to commission Senators.

And how the learned jurist, Judge Story, would have been comforted if he had only known of the theories entertained by the minority, that the governor of a State can appoint Senators whenever the legislature refuses or fails to elect. Had he comprehended this, he never would have given utterance to the sentiment:

It is true that the State legislatures may, by refusing to choose Senators, interrupt the operations of the National Government, and thus involve the country in general ruin.

How can the country be "involved in general ruin" if the executive of the State, by the failure or refusal of legislatures to elect Senators, is empowered to appoint Senators whenever the legislatures refuse or fail to elect? Upon this theory the Senate is indestructible.

That profound expounder of the Constitution, the great Webster, had he been able to have grasped this modern construction, would never have been guilty of the folly of declaring that "the Constitution makes its own preservation depend on individual duty and individual obligation. The States can not omit to appoint Senators. It is not a matter resting in State discretion or State pleasure. It lays its hands on individual conscience and individual duty." Instead of declaring that the existence of the Senate of the United States is dependent upon the "individual conscience" of the members of the State legislatures, he would have said, if the legislature fails to elect, the Constitution "lays its hand" on the executive of the State and commands him to supply the vacancy and keep the Senate always full.

WHERE IS THE SAVING GRACE?

I was greatly impressed the other day by what the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] said in the course of his remarks in this case, especially in view of his contention of the right of the governor to fill all vacancies whenever and however occurring. Let me call the attention of the Senator—and I regret his absence—and of the Senate to his exact language. I read from the RECORD:

I can conceive of cases, and there have been many in recent years, where the failure of the legislature to elect was an honor to the State and a protection to the Senate of the United States. It may very well be that in the contest in the legislature there may be so many on one side and so many on another, and the balance of power between—that body of men who stand as firm as adamant between the two sides, welded together for one reason or another—may be a saving grace in the history of the Senate.

I quite agree with the Senator in this sentiment. The legislature of a State may be so debauched by unwholesome influences, and the rival aspirants so involved in the corruption, that a failure to elect would be the highest duty to the State. But may I be permitted to inquire of the Senator, how, under his theory, would a failure of the legislature to elect, in such case, ever save the State from dishonor if the governor is permitted the moment the legislature adjourns to appoint the very man, possibly, in whose interest the legislature was debauched? How is the Senate to be protected from the presence of one who is obnoxious to a majority of the State legislature, and against whose election a few men stood "firm" and defeated, if the governor can immediately upon the adjournment of the legislature commission the very man whom the legislature refused to elect? Where does the "saving grace in the history of the State" come in, if the governor can appoint the very man against whom the men stood "firm as adamant" until his defeat was consummated?

The contention of the minority makes it absolutely futile for a legislature to stand out and defeat the election of an unworthy candidate, if the executive, the moment his defeat is consummated, can commission to a seat in this body the very man who was defeated.

I beg Senators to do me the justice to believe that I intend no personal allusion at all in this matter.

This whole theory of the minority leads only to confusion and disaster, and if adopted will break down of its own weight.

THE AUTHORITIES.

In the discussion of any legal or constitutional question before a court it is customary to cite the decisions of the court itself and the opinions of its judges upon the question involved, and I shall venture to conform to that practice before this high tribunal in the hope and belief it will be persuasive in the final determination of this matter.

Can it be possible that the opinions of the most profound lawyers and jurists who ever held seats in this Chamber, together with the precedents of a century grounded thereon, are to be swept aside and ignored at the behest of party or personal favoritism? I do not believe it. We shall see.

In the light of the plain terms of the Constitution and the pronounced opinions of some of the most learned men ever holding seats in this body, second to none of whom is the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, it seems to me the contention on behalf of Mr. Quay must fail utterly at the very outset, because the vacancy to which he is commissioned did not happen or take place during the recess of the legislature, but when the legislature was in session and could fill, and is not, therefore, such a vacancy as the executive is permitted under the Constitution to supply.

AN EVENT CAN HAPPEN BUT ONCE.

The minority recognize the fact that the executive can make temporary appointment only to vacancies which "happen" when the legislature is in "recess," and so are driven to contend that, though this vacancy occurred when the legislature was in session, it nevertheless "happened," within the meaning of the Constitution, "during the recess."

In order to bring this case within the meaning of the Constitution we are asked to make "happen" mean a certain event and not a casualty; that "during the recess" means "during the session;" that "otherwise," in the connection it is used, means "anywise;" and that "until the next meeting of the legislature" means "the meeting of every succeeding legislature until the vacancy is filled."

And so, first of all as of prime importance, it must be made to appear in some way, somehow, that this vacancy happened "during the recess of the legislature," or confessedly the appointment of Mr. Quay by the executive of Pennsylvania was without authority of law, and, therefore, absolutely null and void. To this end the contention is made that though the vacancy occurred when the legislature was in session, yet, so soon as the legislature adjourned, the vacancy happened again, and this time "during the recess," and has been happening ever since; that it happened during the session and during the recess. Now, a particular event can not happen but once, and that at a definite moment of time. If this vacancy happened on the 4th of March, 1899, it is impossible for it to happen at any other time or on any other day. It may continue to exist after it happened, but it happens but once. If this vacancy happened when the legislature was in session, on a particular day, it can not happen again on some other day when the legislature is not in session.

It might, with equal propriety, be said that if a given event happened during the nighttime it happened during the daytime the next day, because the consequences of the event continued. We are asked to say the phrase "a vacancy exists in recess" is identical in meaning with the phrase "a vacancy happens in recess." Does "during life" mean the same as "when life begins?" If so, then life begins every moment of its continuance. If a Senator now in this Chamber, while the Senate is in session, should happen to die, would anybody in his senses say that he happened to die some other time, when the Senate was in recess? The condition of death continued, but the event happened when the Senate was in session, and that event can not happen again, unless it can be said, in the words of Paul, "I die daily." If a vessel should break her shaft during a voyage, could it be said she was disabled while in port? She continues disabled, but the accident happened at sea. If a reporter should fall from the gallery and be killed this afternoon, would anybody in his senses say that the reporter died during the recess of the Senate? He would remain dead, but he died during the session. The contention seems to me too trivial for serious consideration.

And so we are asked to believe that the illustrious men of that great Constitutional Convention had so little comprehension of the use and meaning of the English language that they were unable to command appropriate words with which to limit the power of the executive in the matter of temporary appointments.

That all the restraining phraseology employed left the governor with all the power conferred by the original resolve—"vacancies may be supplied by the executive;" that "happen" means "exist;" though Hamilton said in the sixty-seventh number of the Federalist, speaking of this provision of the Constitution:

I mean the power of filling casual vacancies in the Senate. Here is an express power given, in clear and unambiguous terms, to the State executives to fill the casual vacancies in the Senate by temporary appointments.

We are asked to believe that "otherwise," though preceded by the word "resignation," is released from the thraldom of its associate—to which it is bound by every known rule of construction—and permitted to attach itself to any vacancy which may possibly be discovered and needs its supporting influence.

Let me read what Senator Hill said. I believe it will not be questioned that Senator Hill was a great lawyer.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does the Senator refer to Senator Hill, of Georgia?

Mr. BURROWS. Yes; Senator Hill, of Georgia, speaking of the words "by resignation or otherwise," said:

What do those words mean? They were not inserted idly. The framers of the Constitution were not in the habit of inserting idle words in the Constitution. Gentlemen construe the word "otherwise" strangely. They say that the word "otherwise" means any vacancy—that is, they say that the framers of the Constitution put in a qualification by the word "happen" and by the words "by resignation," and then destroy those qualifications by putting in the additional words "or otherwise."

In other words, you use the word "otherwise" so as to leave the power without any qualification, as though it read, "If vacancies should happen to occur during the recess of the legislature, the governor may fill them by temporary appointment." That is your meaning.

I submit to Senators that the very position itself is absurd, for there are well settled rules of law for the construction of this sentence. You can not take a sentence that way and use one word to destroy the meaning of other words.

You can not take a general phrase and use it to destroy the meaning of a specific phrase. On the contrary, you must restrain and qualify the general phrase by the meaning of the specific phrase. That is a well-settled rule. Why? Because it is your duty in construing to give effect to every word and to give a meaning and sense to every word. You are not at liberty to say that the framers of the Constitution not only used idle words, but used words of significance if standing by themselves, and then destroyed the significance of those words by using a general term afterwards.

It is a sound principle of construction that in every instrument you must give sense and meaning to every word if possible.

If the construction contended for by gentlemen who oppose this resolution be true, the words "that may happen" are useless.

Again he says:

"All general phrases are defined and limited by the particular enumeration of powers which would otherwise have been embraced by the general phrases."

In the twelfth volume of Georgia Reports I find this very strongly stated by Chief Justice Lumpkin, who was for over twenty-five years the chief justice of our State, and who has a national reputation as a jurist. On this very point he says:

"I would take occasion to remark that the rule of construction applicable to all writings, constitutions, statutes, contracts, and charters, public or private, and even to ordinary conversation, is this: That general and unlimited terms are restrained and limited by particular recitals when used in connection with them. Not that I would reject the general terms altogether, but I would restrict them to cases of the same kind as those expressly enumerated." (12 Georgia Reports, 530.)

That is the rule. You must restrict the word "otherwise" here. Do not destroy the word "otherwise;" do not let the word "otherwise" destroy the word "resignation;" but you must use the word "otherwise" as applicable to cases like "resignation;" that is, cases of casualty. Therefore, what does the word "otherwise" mean in this connection? It means death, removal, expulsion, failure to accept, or a vacancy happening by any other casualty. Instead of saying "vacancies which happen by resignation, death, removal, promotion," or anything else, the framers used the words "by resignation or otherwise," intending the one word "resignation" to show you that the word "otherwise" was to be applicable only to cases like that governed by "resignation;" that is, cases of casualty which might happen.

It is settled as well as language can settle, just as well as decision in America and England for 100 years can settle it. It is settled by the maxims of the civil law, by the maxims of the common law, and by the maxims of common sense, that when you use the phraseology of "death, resignation, or otherwise," the word "otherwise" must be construed by its connection with death and resignation as to refer to other events similar in their character. The courts have made life, property, and liberty all to hang upon the correctness of that maxim. * * * The legislature of the State of New Hampshire has simply failed to elect a Senator as provided by the Constitution for an original term. The question is whether the governor can appoint to fill that vacancy. I have profound respect for all these gentlemen. I have the greatest respect for their opinions, but when the Constitution in plain, unmistakable phraseology says that if vacancies happen in the Senate, by resignation or otherwise, and every authority of the law, civil, ecclesiastical, and criminal, in England and America, says that "otherwise" there means "by other like casualties," therefore the Constitution is precisely as if it read: "The governor may make temporary appointments to fill vacancies which happen by resignation, death, or expulsion."

PLAIN PROVISIONS ARE DISTORTED.

And so we have this plain provision of the Constitution distorted and made to read, "whenever vacancies exist for any cause, and the legislature is not in session, the executive may make temporary appointment until some legislature fills the vacancy." When I consider how this provision is warped and twisted, that it may temporarily serve personal or party ends, I am again reminded of the words of Senator Hill:

When I hear gentlemen on either side of this Chamber, in either party of this country, take that plain language of the Constitution and construe it to apply to any vacancies that may occur by any means, by the failure of the legislature, willfully or otherwise, to elect a Senator, that the governor can come in and supply the vacancy, I must say it excites my profound astonishment, more than that, my sorrow. It absolutely shakes my confidence in the efficacy of written constitutions.

The primary object of the Constitution is to put in the State legislature the power to fill this office, and nobody else; but casualties may occur, death may come, resignation may come, Senators may be expelled, there may be divers casualties by which the term thus filled by the legislature may become vacant, and vacant during the recess of the legislature when Congress may be in session. It is important, therefore, as was said by Mr. Randolph, to allow the governor power to fill chasms, but not to fill an original term.

What did the great Seward, of New York, say?

This alarm—

Speaking of the effect of the contention of the minority—

This alarm will be increased by the fact that the proceeding will operate to strengthen and increase the provisional prerogative of the governors of the States at the expense of the power conferred by the Constitution on the legislatures of the States; for nothing is clearer than that the power conferred on the governors to fill vacancies was designed to be but occasional and exceptional, and subordinate to that devolved on the legislatures, which was designed to be general, complete, and supreme.

William H. Seward, it will be admitted, was a great constitutional lawyer.

I commend to the Senators from Illinois the language of Justice Davis, who, when in the Senate, commenting upon this very provision, said:

The whole question is in a narrow compass, and the view of the Constitution which has been presented by different gentlemen who have discussed the subject, especially by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. Hill] and last by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. Carpenter], in my judgment presents the proper construction of that instrument.

I do not believe—

that the vacancy mentioned in that clause of the Constitution is anything else than a portion of the six years' term where there is no person qualified to discharge the functions of the office. The principle asserted in the Lanman decision is that the legislature of a State shall provide for all vacancies which must occur at stated and known periods, and that the expiration of a regular term of service is not such a contingency as is embraced in the governor's power under the Constitution; that where opportunity is given to the legislature to choose a Senator the governor can not appoint. A vacancy within the meaning of the constitutional provision does not arise by the failure of a legislature to elect.

I think that the decision in Lanman's case, as I understand it, gives the true interpretation of the Constitution, that when the legislature had the opportunity of providing a Senator but failed, the governor can not appoint.

Attorney-General Garland, a great lawyer, said, in the debate on the Bell case in 1879:

Mr. President, the position that I take in reference to this matter from my reading of the Constitution is that legislatures of the States, being the original constituency of the United States, must themselves by election place a Senator in this body at the beginning of a new term; or, to state the proposition somewhat differently, it is not within the meaning of the Constitution that the governor of a State can put upon the floor of the Senate a Senator at the commencement of a new term of six years, or a new term that might be by the meeting of the legislature afterwards for a shorter period. Before the governor of a State can appoint a Senator to fill what he may consider a vacancy in the Senate, there must not only be an unfilled seat but a broken term previously held by some one else.

According to the interpretation of the Senator from Delaware, if the legislature of any State of the eleven that first ratified the Constitution had failed to send two Senators here to compose the Senate, the governor of the State could have sent two to compose the body. There is no halfway ground, because we have heard it enunciated here by the Senator from Delaware and by the minority report that if the vacancy exists, by a robust and athletic construction of the Constitution, somebody must fill it—it must not go unfilled.

* * * * * * *

Now, we have the vacation of these seats by law. When that is done, according to the fair interpretation of this instrument, the legislature alone can step in. Then:

"And if vacancies happen by resignation or otherwise."

That is, "if vacancies happen" after the seats have been filled, after the legislature has chosen, "by resignation or otherwise," meaning by expulsion or by death. The word "happen," whether you enlarge it or whether you narrow it in its construction, affects at last the incumbent in the seat by some accident or by some casualty. Hence the word "happen" is used, referring to something which takes him out of the seat, leaving both an unfilled seat and a broken term.

That is the fair and proper construction of this instrument, and when you give it that construction you obey the first rule of construing written instruments, which is that every word in the instrument must live and speak; you can not throttle it and take one word out and put in another.

I say, then, on this point, that the legislature being the original constituency, that constituency must first act; and if the person thus chosen falls out of his seat by any accident, any happening of an unforeseen event, then the governor steps in and supplies the place temporarily; says the Constitution, by "temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature."

Mr. Carpenter, of Wisconsin, said:

When the legislature last in session previous to the expiration of a Senatorial term, having power to make an election, refuses or neglects to do so, then until an election can be made, in conformity with the Constitution of the Union, the State, by its legislature, has consented to waive its right to equal representation in this Chamber.

Did Stephen A. Douglas, of Illinois, know anything about the Constitution? He said:

Where a Senatorial term has expired by its own limitation under the Constitution, and an absence of representation results from that cause, it is not a vacancy within the meaning of the Constitution. Vacancies happening in the representation in the Senate during a recess of the legislature may be filled by the governor of a State.

But I presume no man ever contended—certainly not since the Lanman case—that a governor, under the power to fill vacancies, could make an appointment to an original term of office.

Therefore, when we speak of vacancies happening in the constitutional sense, we must be understood as meaning cases where the term has once been filled and subsequently becomes vacant by resignatian or otherwise.

* * * * * * *

Why, sir, the Constitution provides that in the election of Senators generally it shall be done by the legislature of each State; it provides by implication that in case of vacancies which occur during the session of the legislature the legislature shall elect; but it also provides that if the vacancy occurs during the recess of the legislature the legislature shall not elect in the first instance, but that the governor shall appoint, and that the appointment shall continue until the next meeting of the legislature, and that the legislature shall then elect.

Senator Cass, of my own State, a great lawyer and a man of recognized ability, said:

How, then, stands this case, sir? The third clause of the first article of the Constitution provides for the composition of the Senate by fixing the term of service and the mode of selecting the Senators, permanent and temporary. It declares that "if vacancies happen, by resignation or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies." The regular terms of Senators are for six years, and the "vacancies" herein provided for are the unexpired portions of such terms, which are to be "filled" by the legislature when it can act, and when it can not act to be occupied by temporary executive appointments. If, therefore, a Senator resign, or his seat is otherwise vacated, except by the expiration of his term, the "vacancy" is for his original period of service, to be temporarily appointed to by the governor or "filled" by the legislature.

Senator Underwood, of Kentucky, in the Rantoul case, said:

The Constitution shows that it was never intended by its framers that a person should represent a State in this body if it could be avoided unless he came here by an election on the part of the legislature of his State. The Constitution shows that an election is to be preferred to an executive appointment, and you ought to put such construction on the legislation of the country as will give authority to those appointed according to the provisions of that instrument, by the very fountain of power, the legislature elected by the people, and if you were to continue Mr. Winthrop after being officially informed by the great seal of the State that the legislature of the State had made such an election and appointed an officer to discharge the duties of the Senator, we would be going in violation of the spirit of our institutions by continuing in office an individual appointed by one man and allowing him to exercise powers, when the persons possessing the original fountains of power had showed their determination that he should not be continued. It is well known that from political associations I would much prefer the continuance of the present and sitting member to the admission of the other, but still the great principles of the Government are much more dear to me than men. And these are the principles which in the time to come I think ought to be carried out as they are proposed to be carried out by the report of the committee. (Appendix Congressional Globe, 121-122, volume 29.)

Senator James A. Bayard held to the same doctrine:

You find that in reference to the full term of a Senator the provision is that he shall hold his office for six years and be chosen by the legislature. The executive has no authority there. And you find, further, that if the legislature is not in session at the time a vacancy occurs by resignation or otherwise, though it may not even be known to them, yet no authority in such a case is confided to the executive to appoint.

You find, in other words, that within the intent of the Constitution no authority over the subject is meant to be intrusted to the executive whenever the primary power—the legislature—is in existence as an organized body. I am aware that at one time it was decided that even in reference to the full term the executive of a State might make an appointment until the legislature met; but that construction was subsequently overruled by the Senate in the case of Mr. Lanman in the year 1825, and ever since the practice has been uniformly in accordance with the decision in that case.

In reference to the full term it can not be doubted that no authority whatever is confided to the executive. The negation of power in any other event than when the vacancy occurs in recess shows that it was the intent of the Constitution that the executive was merely to provide for casualties happening when the legislative power, which is the primary power, was not in existence, and, of course, could not act.

Senator Mason, of Virginia, said:

The Constitution has created Senatorial terms and has declared that those terms shall last for six years; they are so arranged by another provision of the Constitution that one-third of the Senate go out biennially. What is the language of the Constitution as affecting the duration of the term? The Constitution declares that the seats of the Senators of the first class shall be vacated at the end of two years, of the second class at the end of four, and of the third at the end of six years, thus creating the terms. The language of the Constitution is that the seat "shall be vacated" by the lapse of time, and then new terms commence.

A few words now as to the precedents. Until Lanman's case, according to my recollection, it was considered by the Senate, or rather it was decided by the Senate, manifestly without consideration, that it was competent for the State executive when a term expired in the recess of the legislature to treat that as a vacancy and to fill it accordingly. Such a practice was common until the decision in Lanman's case. I confess that on looking at the Constitution my first impression was that the practice was correct, but on examining the Constitution and weighing it carefully and deliberately I can not entertain a doubt that the decision of Lanman's case was correct, and that when a term expires by constitutional limitation it is not a "vacancy" which the executive can fill.

Senator Butler, in the Phelps case in 1854, said:

It must be conceded that the authority to choose a Senator to commence a new term of six years, after the efflux of a regular term, is exclusively vested in the State legislature.

And referring to the Lanman case, he said:

In 1825 Lanman's case came up for consideration involving both questions. In that case, after a very full debate, it was solemnly decided that it was not competent for the governor of a State to put a member on this floor at the commencement of a term. In other words, it was decided that his power of appointment could not be substituted for the election of the State legislature. Even if such had not been the decision in the case of Lanman, I take it for granted that such would be, and must necessarily be, the decision now.

In the great debate of 1852, Jefferson Davis, then a Senator from the State of Mississippi, said:

Sir, there are two modes of electing Senators—the one by the legislature of a State, the other by executive appointment. And how comes it, Mr. President, that there are two modes? It is well to understand the reason. It was foreseen by the framers of the Constitution that vacancies would occur—would "happen," as the Constitution expresses it—during the "recess" of the legislature of a State, and consequently that a State would be deprived of its representation, for a time at least, unless that vacancy could be supplied. Hence it gives to the executive of a State the power of a temporary appointment, as the Constitution expresses it, a temporary appointment to hold until the legislature, as I shall show you, has had an opportunity to appoint; and when the legislature has once had that opportunity and declined or omitted to exercise its power, the executive no longer has any power over the subject. It has been justly enough observed here that the word "until," in the clause of the Constitution, qualifies the word "power;" that is, he shall appoint to hold until the legislature discharges that duty or has an opportunity to discharge it.

I wish to read a word from George E. Badger, of North Carolina, because it is said of him that he was the greatest lawyer his State ever produced, and Senator Hill, of Georgia, speaking of him, said:

Mr. Badger, of North Carolina, is considered by those who knew him to be one of the greatest lawyers this country ever produced. That is his character and reputation to this day. There are some who believe a greater lawyer never lived than Senator Badger, of North Carolina. He certainly stood high among all the great lights of his day.

Now, what did Badger say?

The vacancies which the executive of a State is authorized to fill are never vacancies that happen by the efflux of time. They are not foreseen vacancies. They are vacancies that happen by resignation or otherwise. Mr. President, from an exceeding desire to give this clause of the Constitution such a construction as would keep the Senate always full, I labored hard a year or two ago, when we had questions of this kind before us, to find out some method of supporting in my own mind a construction that a vacancy happening by efflux of time, and not filled beforehand by the legislature, might be brought within this limited power conferred on the executive.

But, sir, I have been obliged to abandon it. "By resignation or otherwise" is the language. We must expound the word "otherwise" to apply to vacancies happening by similar events; that is, unforeseen events—death, resignation, appointment to an office which disqualifies—but it can not be applied to the expiration of a term of a Senator which leaves a seat vacant on this floor. My opinion therefore is that the governor of a State has no power to fill a vacancy in this body which is brought about by the expiration or efflux of the time for which the Senator was elected; in other words, at the termination of his term in the Senate. It must be a vacancy in the term happening during the recess of the legislature. It must be a vacancy in the term happening by resignation or other casualty. That I understand to have been the express and solemn decision of the Senate in Lanman's case in 1825, overruling one or two earlier decisions, which had passed, perhaps, without full consideration.

The greatest lawyer on earth in his day will, I am sure, be heard by the Senate.

The other day the Senator from Maryland read a letter from Senator Edmunds—and I am apprehensive that all the Senators did not hear it, and I am therefore going to repeat it—written September 1, 1885.

Mr. BACON. Written by whom?

Mr. BURROWS. By Senator Edmunds, in relation to the Oregon matter.

BURLINGTON, VT., September 1, 1885.

DEAR SIR: I have yours of the 21st ultimo. The Constitution, as you know, provides respecting Senators that "if vacancies happen by resignation or otherwise during the recess of the legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancy."

It has been held by the Senate, and may now be considered as the settled law of that body, that if a State legislature has once acted or had an opportunity to act while a vacancy exists the governor has no power to supply the failure of the legislature to fill it up.

Applying this rule to the case of Oregon, a vacancy existed on and after the 4th day of March, 1885, and your legislature, as I understand it, continued to sit a long time after that date and had the opportunity to fill the vacancy, so that the vacancy did not happen during a recess of the legislature, and it now only exists because the legislature failed in its duty of keeping its Senatorial representation full.

If we construe this clause of the Constitution as some Democratic Presidents have the corresponding clause respecting the President filling vacancies in offices, so as to make it mean that if vacancies happen to exist during any recess the governor may fill them, it would be an indefinite power to be exerted just so long as the legislature failed, which is not according either to the language or spirit of the Constitution. But, however we may reason about it, the Senate will be obliged to reverse its repeated decisions on the subject in order to admit a Senator appointed by the governor under such circumstances. Trusting that in some way a Republican Senator from Oregon may be preserved to us at a time when the only security for safe and conservative government lies within the Senate,

I am, very truly yours,

GEORGE F. EDMUNDS.

Will the Senate read the opinion of this great constitutional lawyer out of the record and trample his words under foot?

Senators here will remember Senator Beck, of Kentucky. What did he say in the Bell case?

I have come to the conclusion that the legislature of the State is the primal constituency of the United States Senator, and it is only when the State legislature has no opportunity to act that the governor is permitted to fill the place temporarily until the legislature can act. * * * The Constitution of the United States intended that whenever it had an opportunity to elect a Senator it should exercise that power, and that the governor should only intervene when that opportunity for any cause was denied to the legislature. It never was intended that the governor should exercise his patronage, except when the legislative assembly had no power to exercise its authority. It was intended to give each State equal representation in the Senate, and whenever there was no opportunity for the legislature to act, and in no other state of the case was authority given to the executive.

Mr. Groome, of Maryland, said:

That whenever a legislature is charged by law with the duty of filling a Senatorial term and refuses or neglects to discharge that duty, that term must remain vacant until the legislature, which represents the sovereignty of the State, chooses to discharge the duty which the law devolves upon it. Such a vacancy is not one which the executive of the State can fill by a temporary appointment made either before or after the vacancy actually occurs, because the State, through the legislature, has decided to deprive itself for the time being of an equal representation in the Senate.

Mr. President, I might continue these citations indefinitely, for almost every great man holding a seat in the Senate has maintained this doctrine.

May I be permitted to read what the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], who illumines and adorns every subject he touches, said in 1893?

Nine cases besides the Tracy case were decided between 1801 and 1825, every one of them without debate. So far as I have been able to find by diligent search, not one word was said in discussion until we came to 1825, to the Lanman case, when the Senate took up this question and debated it for three days. The result of that debate was that the Senate deliberately determined that the governor did not have the right to fill an original term by appointment.

In other words, the Senate of the United States declared the doctrine about which I have not the slightest doubt, and the more I examine it the more confirmed I am in the opinion that the men who made the Constitution intended that the legislature alone should fill a full term and commence it. After they had filled it, after they had elected, then a broken term caused by death, resignation, or otherwise could be filled by appointment, until when? Until the legislature should again meet.

From 1825, in the Lanman case, up to 1879, more than fifty years, the doctrine for which I contend to-day was never questioned. * * *

Referring to the contest for Senator in Missouri, in which Mr. Benton was a candidate, Senator VEST said:

"For the two years we were unable to elect Mr. Benton was one of the candidates. During those two years, when party spirit ran so high that families were divided, brother against brother, father against son—and the scars of the contest yet remain politically in our State—the governor was an anti-Benton man, bitterly opposed to Mr. Benton, and yet he never dreamed, nor did such lawyers as Geyer, Napton, and Scott ever dream, that the governor had the right to fill that original term. Everything was resorted to in order to achieve success in that terrible contest, and yet neither party ever thought the right existed in the governor of Missouri to send another Senator to this body.

"In eight other cases during the fifty-four years from 1825 to 1879 States were represented in this body by but one Senator, because the legislature had not elected, and nobody dreamed until 1879 that the doctrine in the Lanman case was to be disturbed and the contention made which is made here to-day in this body.

"If the legislature has started the term and done all that the Constitution imposes upon it as a duty, then, if for any cause, in the recess of the legislature, a vacancy happens, the governor may appoint, but not otherwise.

"My contention here is that the original, primary power to start a full term in the Senate is with the legislature, and that the governor can only appoint as to a broken term. That is my contention.

"Now, if the legislature have elected a man and he refuses to accept, they have commenced a term; they have done all they can do; they have complied with the meaning of the Constitution; they have preserved the great fundamental doctrine that the legislatures of the States are our primary constituencies. That is my meaning. I do not care if it is but for one minute after the legislature has performed its duty, the term has commenced, and then, if the Senator refuses to accept, the governor may appoint until another legislature comes in and our primary constituency again undertakes to comply with the Constitution.

"I say absolutely there is no such thing known to the Constitution in my judgment as the power of a governor to appoint for a term which has not been commenced by the legislature."

I might quote for the benefit of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL], if he were present, from John Randolph Tucker, so long an eminent member of the House of Representatives and chairman of the Judiciary Committee, and subsequently professor of constitutional and international law, etc., in Washington and Lee University, in his work on the Constitution of the United States, in which, speaking of this clause, he says:

The clause then proceeds: "If vacancies happen by resignation or otherwise during the recess of the legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies." In Lanman's case the Senate decided that the executive could not appoint one to fill a vacancy which had not already occurred, and the executive was to wait the expiration of the term of the incumbent before he could do so. It will be perceived that the power of the State executive to appoint only exists when the legislature is not in session, and the term of the appointee only continues until the next meeting of the legislature. The phrase "until the next meeting of the legislature" has been construed to mean that such appointee shall hold, not up to the first or any other day of the session, but during the whole period to the time when the legislature fills the vacancy.

Then, discussing the question pro and con, he says:

The better opinion would seem to be that where the term has never been filled it is a vacancy in the office by nonexercise of the elective function by the legislature, which function the executive is not competent to perform. The executive power is only called into exercise where the legislature, by reason of the happening of the vacancy, has had no opportunity to exercise its original function of election. This executive power is never to be exercised where the legislature has had the opportunity to elect, but declines to do so. There may be reasons why it should so decline; and if so, it would be out of place for the executive to elect where the legislature has deliberately declined to exercise the power.

WHAT THE PRECEDENTS SHOW.

Mr. President, how does this case stand in the light of the precedents, laying aside the opinion of all the great men who in times past held seats in this Chamber?

I shall not review them in detail; that has already been done by the able and distinguished Senator from Tennessee [Mr. TURLEY] and others. It is sufficient for my purpose to say that since the organization of the Senate the right of appointment has been exercised, or attempted to be exercised, by State executives in 160 cases, showing the wisdom of the fathers in making this provision.

Classified according to the cause of the vacancy which occasioned the appointment, the cases stand as follows:

Resignation	64
Death	71
Refusal to act	1
Expulsion	3
Incompatible office	1
Expiration of term	20
Total	160

It will be seen, therefore, that only twenty vacancies have arisen by expiration of term, as in this case, and of these twenty cases of vacancy caused by the expiration of the term eighteen were cases in which the term expired when the legislature was not in session—was in recess.

In the Allen case and Beckwith case, the two remaining cases out of the twenty, the terms expired when the legislature was in session, and the Senate refused to receive into this body either of the appointees in those two cases, and for the reason that the vacancy occurred when the legislature was in session.

Of the eighteen cases in which the vacancy was caused by the expiration of the term in recess, eight were contested and ten passed sub silentio.

The contested cases are—
Tracy, Smith, Lanman, Sevier, Bell, Blair, Mantle, and Corbett—8.

The uncontested cases are—
Cocke, Hindman, Condit, Anderson, Cutts, Williams, Pasco, Marston, Wood, and Henderson—10.

Of the 8 contested cases, 1 (the Smith case) did not relate to a right to be seated, but to the expiration of the governor's commission. Of the 7 cases that related to the right to take a seat, 4 were cases in which the occurrence of the vacancy could be foreseen and provided for, as follows: Tracy, Lanman, Mantle, and Corbett. Tracy (1801) was the only appointee seated. Lanman, Mantle, and Corbett were rejected. Of the 3 cases remaining, all were cases in which the occurrence of the vacancy could not be foreseen, as in the Sevier case, or, if foreseen, could not be provided for in advance, as in the Bell and Blair cases. The 3 appointees were, accordingly, seated.

Of the 10 uncontested cases, the first 6 arose prior to 1818. The Marston case arose in 1889; the Pasco case in 1893; the Wood and Henderson cases in 1898. The following of the early precedents in the Marston and Pasco cases was followed by the contest in the Mantle case and the definite establishment of the modern and settled rule. That rule, as enunciated in the Mantle and Corbett cases, and acted upon in Wood's case and Henderson's case, is that a governor has no right to make a temporary appointment in case of a vacancy caused by the expiration of a prior term when the vacancy can be foreseen and provided for by the legislature.

From this it appears that:

First. In no case (except Allen and Beckwith) has the Senate been called upon to act upon a gubernatorial appointment where the prior term expired during the session of the legislature. Allen and Beckwith were not seated.

Second. In no case has the Senate recognized the right of the governor to appoint to a vacancy which happened when the legislature was in session.

Third. In no case has the Senate seated an appointee where the legislature has had an opportunity to act after the vacancy occurred.

Fourth. In no contested case since 1801 has an appointee been seated when the occurrence of the vacancy could be foreseen and provided for in advance by the legislature.

Whatever meaning we may therefore give to the word "happen," to the word "otherwise," to the term "during recess," the question has been settled for seventy-five years, ever since the Lanman case, by an unbroken line of precedents of the Senate; and if it is overturned now it will be the first time since then that that rule has been violated; and, more than that, never has the Senate recognized the right of a governor to appoint to a vacancy which occurred when the legislature was in session.

ABSTRACT OF CASES.

Of the 16 contested cases that have come before the Senate, 11 have involved the right of the governor's appointee to take his seat and 5 have been concerned with the question of the expiration of the governor's commission. The 11 contested cases involving the right to take the seat are:

1. Kensey Johns, 1794.
2. Urial Tracy, 1801.
3. James Lanman, 1825.
4. Ambrose H. Sevier, 1836.
5. Charles H. Bell, 1879.
6. Henry W. Blair, 1885.
7. Horace Chilton, 1891.
8. Lee Mantle, 1893.
9. John B. Allen, 1893.

10. Ashael C. Beckwith, 1893.
11. Henry W. Corbett, 1898.

The 5 contested cases concerning the expiration of the governor's commission are:

1. Samuel Smith, 1809.
2. Robert C. Winthrop, 1851.
3. Archibald Dixon, 1852.
4. Samuel S. Phelps, 1853.
5. Jared W. Williams, 1853.

Of the 11 contested cases involving the right to take the seat, 1 was a case (Kensey Johns, 1794) where the vacancy occurred through resignation; the remaining 10 were cases of the expiration of a prior term. The facts in the 11 cases are as follows:

1. Kensey Johns (Taft, page 1): Read, a Senator from the State of Delaware, resigned in December, 1793, the legislature of Delaware not being in session at the time. The legislature met in January, 1794, and adjourned in February without filling the vacancy. In March the governor appointed Johns. It was held he was not entitled to his seat. In this case it will be observed that the legislature had an opportunity to elect after the vacancy occurred. The governor's right was at an end. Suppose the governor had appointed Johns immediately upon Read's resignation. He would have been entitled to sit (under the decision in the Phelps and Williams cases) until the adjournment of the legislature in February, 1794. Then his commission would have expired. According to the Senator from Massachusetts, the governor might have reappointed immediately thereafter, but, according to the Johns case, the commission would be void.

2. Urial Tracy (Taft, page 3): Tracy's term expired March 3, 1801. The legislature had adjourned prior to February 20, and on that date the governor issued his commission to Tracy, to date from March 3. It was held that Tracy was entitled to the seat. The vacancy occurred in recess. The legislature was not in session after its occurrence.

3. James Lanman (Taft, page 5): Lanman's term expired March 3, 1825. The legislature had adjourned prior to February 8. On that date the governor had issued his commission to Lanman, to take effect March 3. It was held that Lanman was not entitled to his seat. The vacancy occurred in recess. The legislature was not in session after its occurrence. But, either (1) because the appointment was made before the vacancy occurred, or (2) because the vacancy could be foreseen and provided for in advance, the appointee was rejected, herein reversing the Tracy case.

4. Ambrose H. Sevier (Taft, page 7): Sevier and Fulton were elected the first Senators from Arkansas. Sevier drew the short term, expiring four months thereafter, on March 3, 1837. Before the fact of the drawing was known in Arkansas the legislature adjourned and was not again in session until after the vacancy occurred. In anticipation of the vacancy, the governor, in January, 1837, appointed Sevier, the commission to take effect March 3 following. It was held that Sevier was entitled to the seat. The vacancy occurred in recess. Its occurrence was not foreseen and, after its occurrence, the legislature had no opportunity to fill it.

5. Charles H. Bell (Taft, page 26): In March, 1878, the last legislature under the old constitution of New Hampshire was elected, its term to begin in June, 1878, and to terminate in May, 1879. The first legislature under the new constitution was elected in November, 1878, its term to begin in June, 1879. Wadleigh's term expired March 3, 1879. The old legislature was not in session, and could not have elected in advance, not being the "last legislature chosen by the people." The new legislature was not in session and would not be for three months. The governor therefore appointed, on March 13, 1879, Charles H. Bell to hold the office temporarily. It was held that Mr. Bell was entitled to the seat. The vacancy occurred in the recess, and there was no opportunity for legislative action, either before or after its occurrence.

6. Henry W. Blair (Taft, page 36): A legislature was elected in November, 1882, its term to begin in June, 1883. Another legislature was elected in November, 1884, its term to begin in June, 1885. When, therefore, Mr. Blair's term expired March 3, 1885, no legislature was in session and no legislature had had an opportunity to provide for the vacancy in advance. The governor appointed Mr. Blair to succeed himself, and it was held that he was entitled to the seat. The question and the decision are the same as in the Bell case.

7. Horace Chilton (Taft, page 48): Senator Reagan resigned, to take effect June 10, 1891. On April 25, 1891, the legislature not being in session and having had no opportunity to act, the governor appointed Mr. Chilton, the commission to be operative from June 10. It was held that Mr. Chilton was entitled to the seat. If the Lanman case is regarded as negativing the right of a governor to act in anticipation of a vacancy, the Sevier case is inconsistent with it, and the Chilton case overrules it.

8. Lee Mantle: The term of Sanders expired March 3, 1893. Before that date the legislature adjourned without effecting an election. On March 4 the governor appointed Mantle. It was held that he was not entitled to his seat. The vacancy occurred in recess, and no legislative opportunity to act was afforded after its occurrence, but, as in the Lanman case, the vacancy was foreseen and could have been provided for.

9. John B. Allen: The legislature was in session on March 3, 1893, when the Senatorial term expired. The vacancy was foreseen and could have been filled by the legislature in advance or after its occurrence. The legislature adjourned without filling it. The governor, on March 10, appointed Allen. It was held he was not entitled to his seat. This is on all fours with the case at issue, except that in Mr. Quay's case the legislative opportunity to act after the vacancy occurred was far more ample—the legislature remaining in session forty-seven days.

10. Ashael C. Beckwith: Warren's term expired March 3, 1893. The legislature, having had an opportunity to act in advance, adjourned without effecting an election. On March 9 the governor appointed Beckwith. It was held that he was not entitled to the seat.

THE KENSEY JOHNS CASE IN PARTICULAR.

In this connection I desire to call special attention of the Senate to the case of Kensey Johns, which arose in 1794, only five years after the organization of the first Senate, in which body there were a considerable number of members who had previously been members of the Constitutional Convention, and, of course, participated in the framing of this provision of the Constitution, and whose opinions, therefore, should command great weight. It is said—

That contemporary construction put upon the language or meaning of a constitution at the time of its adoption, or shortly after, by members of the convention which framed it, is properly resorted to to illustrate and confirm the text, to explain a doubtful phrase, or to expound an obscure clause.

The opinion of members of the Senate at that time, who were members of the Constitutional Convention, ought, therefore, to come to us with very great force.

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] very well said recently, in his remarks on this case, in reply to the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WELLINGTON]:

He has invoked the lessons and the actions of the past. I agree with him that profound respect is to be accorded to the action of prior Senates. I agree with him that the men who acted in this body near the time of the adoption of the Constitution knew quite as much about it as we who come here many, many years after its adoption.

The Senator then called the attention of the Senator from Maryland to a case which occurred in 1809, the Smith case, and said:

No man in that body—it was only twenty years after the adoption of the Constitution, and, I suppose, or have supposed, they knew as much about the Constitution in 1809 as we do in 1900, and cared as much for their obligation to support it as we do.

If the opinion of members of the Senate twenty years after the organization of the Government come to the Senator from Wisconsin with so much force, how convincing must be the opinion of the Senate only five years after its organization, when nearly one-fourth of its membership consisted of gentlemen who had been members of the Constitutional Convention? Let me invoke, therefore, the attention of the Senate particularly to this case.

George Read, a Senator from the State of Delaware, resigned his seat in the United States Senate on the 18th day of December, 1793. The legislature of the State met in January, 1794, and adjourned in February thereafter without filling the vacancy.

On the 19th of March, 1794, the governor appointed Kensey Johns. There had been a meeting of the legislature between the resignation and the appointment. His credentials were referred to the Committee on Elections of the Senate, consisting of seven members, which committee reported, with only one dissenting vote, that the governor had no power to make the appointment, and Mr. Johns was rejected. True, that was not an appointment by the governor at the beginning of a term, but the same principle was involved, namely, that where the legislature has the opportunity to fill a vacancy happening in the representation of the State in the Senate of the United States, and fails to perform its duty in this regard for any reason, the governor has no power to appoint.

The determination of the Senate in that case ought to appeal to us with very great force. It came up and was decided within five years after the inauguration of the Government, when Washington was in the executive chair and the men who had participated in the Constitutional Convention were still alive and whose opinions were undoubtedly sought and must have been potential in shaping the judgment of the Senate. More than that, in that very Senate sat several Senators who were members of the Constitutional Convention which considered and framed these provisions of the Constitution now in controversy, and certainly they ought to have known, and unquestionably did know, just what these provisions meant.

There was Pierce Butler, of South Carolina, a Delegate in the old Congress and the first Senator from that State; Oliver Ellsworth, of Connecticut, who had served in the old Congress, been a judge of the superior court, elected a Senator from that State, afterwards appointed Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States by President Washington, and subsequently became minister to France; Rufus King, of Massachusetts, a Delegate in the old Congress, member of the State legislature, who subsequently became a Senator from the Empire State and minister to England; John Langdon, of New Hampshire, of legislative experience in the old Congress, elected to the Senate in 1789, and became President pro tempore of that body; and Alexander Martin, of North Carolina, speaker of the State senate and governor of his State.

All these Senators who participated in the work of framing the Constitution of the United States voted that Mr. Johns was not entitled to a seat, and admission was refused him by a vote of 20 to 7. It is no violent presumption to assume that these Senators, who were members of the Constitutional Convention and participated in its formation, knew what they were doing when they voted that the governor had no power to appoint Kensey Johns.

I desire to read from the Official Record, the Annals of Congress, Third Congress, the proceedings of the Senate in this case in detail.

Monday, March 24, 1794.

Kensey Johns appeared and produced his credentials of an appointment by the governor of the State of Delaware as a Senator for the United States, which were read. Whereupon, it was moved that they be referred to the consideration of the Committee of Elections before the said Kensey Johns should be permitted to qualify, who are directed to report thereon; and it passed in the affirmative.

Thursday, March 27.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the report of the Committee of Elections, to whom was referred the credentials of Kensey Johns, appointed by the executive of the State of Delaware to be a Senator of the United States. On motion that the report be recommitted, it passed in the negative; and, after progress, it was ordered that the further consideration of this report be postponed until to-morrow.

Friday, March 28.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Elections, to whom was referred the credentials of Kensey Johns, appointed by the executive of the State of Delaware to be a Senator of the United States; which report is as follows:

"The Committee of Elections, to whom was referred the credentials of an appointment by the governor of the State of Delaware of Kensey Johns as a Senator of the United States, having had the same under consideration, report:

"That George Read, a Senator for the State of Delaware, resigned his seat upon the 18th day of December, 1793, and during the recess of the legislature of said State.

"That the legislature of the said State met in January and adjourned in February, 1794.

"That upon the 19th day of March, and subsequent to the adjournment of the said legislature, Kensey Johns was appointed by the governor of said State to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation aforesaid.

"Whereupon the committee submit the following resolution:

"'Resolved, That Kensey Johns, appointed by the governor of the State of Delaware as a Senator of the United States for said State, is not entitled to a seat in the Senate of the United States, a session of the legislature of said State having intervened between the resignation of the said George Read and the appointment of the said Kensey Johns.'"

On the question to agree to this report it passed in the affirmative—yeas 20, nays 7.

From this report of the Committee on Elections, which consisted of Bradley, Ellsworth, Mitchell, Rutherford, Brown, Livermore, and Taylor, it will be observed that the committee reported against the right of Kensey Johns to a seat, upon the express ground that—

A session of the legislature of the said State having intervened between the resignation of the said George Read and the appointment of the said Kensey Johns.

That being the case, it was the duty of the legislature to elect. The report was adopted by the Senate by a vote of 20 yeas to 7 nays. It is worthy of note in this connection that the Committee on Elections, which gave this case special preliminary consideration, consisted of seven Senators, among whom was Ellsworth, who was one of the most conspicuous members of the Constitutional Convention and of whom the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] very properly said the other day in debate:

Than whom there was no greater statesman and constitutional lawyer on the face of the earth anywhere.

And he, as a member of this committee, not only reported against the right of the governor to appoint in that case, but on the final vote in the Senate voted to keep the seat empty and that the State should go unrepresented of one Senator until a Senator had been properly elected. He did not regard it so important to keep the Senate full, even when it consisted of but 30 members, as to admit to membership anyone not lawfully commissioned. Elsworth, it must be remembered, was not only the "greatest lawyer on earth" and a member of the Constitutional Convention, but he was also a member of the committee of detail to amplify and give expression to the principles of government which the Convention had adopted, and was, therefore, specially qualified to speak, and his opinion in this case comes to us with peculiar force. It is not saying too much of Mr. Ellsworth that he was not only one of the most active members of the Constitutional Convention, but one of the most influential, and when he gave his interpretation of this provision of the Constitution, it ought to come home to the members of the Senate to-day, as it did to the Senate then, with convincing power.

The last instance in which this doctrine was affirmed was the Corbett case, decided by the Senate but two years ago and fresh in the minds of many Senators then and now members of the Senate. What were the facts in that case?

THE HENRY W. CORBETT CASE.

On January 11, 1897, the senate of Oregon effected a permanent organization. Afterwards the house effected a permanent organization, but neither the executive nor the senate ever recognized it. The members of both branches dispersed and returned to their homes without providing for the vacancy to occur thereafter on March 3, by the expiration of the term of Mitchell. On March 6 the governor appointed Corbett. It was held by the Senate he was not entitled to the seat. The vacancy occurred in recess, but it was a vacancy foreseen and susceptible of being provided for. On the question of fact—whether there ever was a legislature that could have provided for the vacancy—there is room for difference of opinion. A Senator might well have voted for Mr. Corbett upon the theory that the legislature of Oregon was never organized, and therefore there had been no opportunity to elect, and yet in this case, where the legislature was organized and in session many weeks after the vacancy occurred, feel compelled to vote against Mr. Quay.

I will send to the desk, because it is gratifying to be sustained in that case by the vote of the Senate, and ask the Secretary to read the vote in the affirmative upon that question.

Let me say that in the Corbett case, however, both Senators from Pennsylvania are recorded against the power of the executive to appoint. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Fifty-fifth Congress, second session, page 2274.)

The Secretary read the resolution reported by Mr. CAFFERY from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, January 20, 1898, as follows:

"Resolved, That the Hon. Henry W. Corbett is not entitled to take his seat in this body as a Senator from the State of Oregon."

Mr. HOAR. I move to amend the resolution by striking out the word "not."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In the first line it is proposed to strike out the word "not;" so as to make the resolution read:

"Resolved, That the Hon. Henry W. Corbett is entitled to take his seat in this body as a Senator from the State of Oregon."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. MORGAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

The motion of Mr. HOAR to strike out the word "not" was lost by a vote of 19 to 50.

Upon the passage of the resolution the vote stood 50 yeas to 19 nays, as follows.

I ask the Secretary to read the names of those who voted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

YEAS—50.

Allen,	Davis,	McMillan,	Roach,
Bacon,	Deboe,	Mallory,	Shoup,
Bate,	Faulkner,	Martin,	Stewart,
Berry,	Gallinger,	Mills,	Teller,

Chilton,	Jones, Ark.	Penrose,	Vest,
Clark,	Jones, Nev.	Pettigrew,	Warren,
Clay,	Kenney,	Pettus,	Wellington.
Cockrell,	Lindsay,	Platt, Conn.
Cullom,	McBride,	Rawlins,

Mr. BURROWS. Never mind the negative vote, Mr. President.

Mr. BACON. I hope the full vote may be read.

Mr. BURROWS. There were only 19 in the negative.

Mr. SCOTT. I ask that the full vote may be read.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

Mr. BURROWS. Let the negative vote be read if that is desired.

The Secretary read as follows:

NAYS—19.

Aldrich,	Frye,	Lodge,	Sewell,
Atkison,	Hanna,	Mantle,	Turner,
Baker,	Hansbrough,	Mason,	Wetmore,
Fairbanks,	Hawley,	Morrill,	Wilson.

NOT VOTING—20.

Cannon,	Harris,	Murphy,	Smith,
Chandler,	Kyle,	Platt, N. Y.	Spooner,
Daniel,	McEnery,	Pritchard,	Walthall,
Elkins,	McLaurin,	Proctor,	White,
Gear,	Morgan,	Quay,	Wolcott.

Mr. BURROWS. I have been requested to state upon what motion that vote was taken. The first vote was upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts to strike out the word "not," which was lost by a vote of 19 to 50; and this vote was upon the passage of the resolution that Mr. Corbett was not entitled to his seat, and that vote stood 50 to 19.

Mr. President, in the light of these precedents and in face of the vote in the last Congress in the Corbett case, I submit it is asking a great deal, it is a heavy draft even on the demands of friendship, for the claimant in this case to insist that the Senate shall reverse the adjudications of a hundred years, which he himself and his colleague have so recently approved, that he may gain at best but a temporary seat in this body. And it is little less than audacious for the governor of the State of Pennsylvania to disregard the mandates of the constitution of his State, which he has sworn to support, refusing to call the legislature together to elect a Senator, and force the Senate of the United States to place its stamp of approval upon his disregard of official duty and his assumption of power. Why does he not obey the constitution of his State, which provides:

In case of a vacancy in the office of United States Senator from this Commonwealth in a recess between sessions, the governor shall convene the two houses by proclamation on notice not exceeding sixty days to fill the same.

It is answered the legislature as at present constituted would not elect. How is the executive possessed of that knowledge? It was so declared in California, and yet an extra session broke the "deadlock" and the vacant seat of that State is filled by one of her most distinguished citizens. Why not emulate her example? The reason is manifest. If an extra session of the legislature were called and it should fail to elect a Senator and adjourn, the power of the executive to make temporary appointment would be exhausted, for he can only appoint until the next meeting of the legislature, unless the Senate shall hold—which is the one remaining step to be taken—that the governor may appoint as often as the legislature fails to elect; and so by executive appointment fill a seat in this body for the entire term of six years.

SENATE ALWAYS FULL.

What excuse is offered for this stretch of gubernatorial authority? It is said the membership of the Senate ought always to be full. Concede it. My answer is that a method has been provided under the Constitution by means of which that end can always be attained without this extraordinary assumption of power. Legislatures and executives have but to perform their legitimate functions under the Constitution to accomplish the desired result, and I submit the framers of the Constitution took no thought beyond that. I find nowhere, except as embodied in the Constitution itself, any special desire or purpose to keep the Senate always full.

The Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER], following the lead of the Senator from Massachusetts, finds a warrant for this assumption in the last clause of Article V of the Constitution:

No State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate.

The attempt to make this provision of the Constitution do service in support of the right of a governor to make temporary appointment of Senators is not only farfetched, but has absolutely nothing to do with the question in hand. Article V prescribes the method by which the Constitution can be amended by a vote of three-fourths of the States, except in two particulars. The great struggle in the Convention was to secure equality of representation in the Senate—that the States should be equal in this body; and while the Constitution was open to amendment in every other particular, yet no amendment should be made which should deprive the States of equal representation in the Senate without their consent. This provision has absolutely nothing to do with the question of keeping the Senate full by executive appointment. It is not the first time this theory of keeping the Senate always full has been advanced, and the opinion of others upon the question may be instructive.

Senator Vance, in 1893, speaking of the Constitution and keeping the Senate always full, said:

The danger or the inconvenience supposed to arise from the Senate not being "always full" is not to be compared for a moment with the dangers which would ensue if the practice were followed of filling the Senate with members who are not entitled by the prescriptions of the Constitution to sit here. Into this temple of our liberties no man should be permitted to enter except by the door of the Constitution.

* * * * * * *

There should be no politics in the decision of this question. No other consideration should enter into it but that of a sincere desire to maintain the letter and spirit of the Constitution. Doubtless many of the complicated decisions which this body has made have arisen from the pressure of temporary circumstances of one kind or another. It is a great question which should be decided with proper solemnity.

Senator Carpenter in 1879, on the Bell case, said:

The old legislature had the power, in my judgment, to elect a Senator, and ought to have elected one at its session in June last.

As it did not, the State must take the consequences and be partially represented until the legislature shall be in session to elect a Senator. In this matter the legislature represents the State; and when the legislature at the last session previous to the expiration of a Senatorial term, having power to make an election, refuses or neglects to do so, then, until an election can be made in conformity with the Constitution of the Union, the State, by its legislature, has consented to waive its right of equal representation in this Chamber.

The great Senator Garland said:

In my humble opinion, the theory that the Senate must be full, and that where the legislature fails for any cause to fill a seat, the governor, therefore, must do it or somebody must do it, finds no support in the Constitution.

Senator Vance again said:

The Constitution provides that each State shall have the right to be fully represented in the Senate, and it is the business of this body, as a part of the lawmaking power, to see that that right is jealously preserved to each State. Whether that State shall in fact have its full representation here or not depends upon the State itself. If it sees proper to withhold a Senator by failing to select him in the constitutional way, it is the sole business and outlook of the State, and to speak of depriving the State of her representative in the Senate because she does not see proper to comply with the Constitution in choosing him is an abuse of terms.

If there be any duty specially imposed as to keeping the Senate full, it is imposed upon those who are charged with the creation of Senators by the Constitution and not upon us. We sit here only to judge of the election and qualification of those who come to us claiming to be Senators; it is in no sense our duty to supply the defects and cure the failures of constitutional Senator makers to perform their sworn functions.

Senator Douglas, in the Dixon-Meriwether case from Kentucky, said:

I apprehend that I will go as far as he or any other man in advocating the true rights of the States. What is the right of a State, then, as connected with representation in this body? It is a right derived from the Constitution of the United States to be represented in this body in pursuance of the Constitution. It is not a right to be represented as Kentucky pleases or as any other State pleases, but it is a right to be represented as the Constitution provides. She has no right to any other representation or mode of appointment than that authorized and prescribed by the Constitution. To allow her or to compel her to be represented here, then, in any other mode than that appointed in the Constitution is a violation of State rights and of State sovereignty, too. The question here is, What is the mode of representation to which Kentucky is entitled in this case?

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] the other day, in support of his contention that the Senate ought always to be full, said:

Why, Mr. President, they knew as well as you know how important a single vote may be. A single vote within the last twelve or thirteen months would have changed the whole policy of our Government with reference to imperialism. A single vote saved Andrew Johnson from impeachment.

I fully agree with the Senator that a single vote sometimes is decisive of a great issue and may determine the course of empire, and for that very reason we should guard the portals of this Chamber against the entrance of any man who does not bear the unquestioned credentials of his high office. To change "the whole policy of our Government" by a single vote, which never ought to have been recorded, would be a public crime. These seats ought always to be full, but they better be empty than to be seized by those who have no constitutional right to hold them.

Senator Saulsbury said:

The idea has been thrown out here that the paramount purpose of the Convention was to have a Senate at all times full. That express declaration is made in the report of the views of the minority. They say: "The purpose of the Constitution is to have the Senate always full." The idea underlies every argument which I have heard made in support of the views of the minority, that the great controlling purpose of the Constitution is that this body should always be full.

Such an idea is most erroneous. The Convention which framed the Constitution took ample care to provide that less than a full Senate should be competent to do business. It is provided in the Constitution that a majority of the Senate shall be a quorum and competent to transact business. The idea of having the Senate always full did not enter into the minds of the members of the Convention. They knew that it would be utterly impossible to have the Senate always full. No, sir; there was a higher purpose which controlled the deliberations of that body in the formation of the Senate, and that was to secure the equal right of representation on the part of all the States.

DISASTROUS CONSEQUENCES OF POLICY OF MINORITY.

The disastrous consequences sure to flow from the reversal of the established policy of the Senate can not, in my judgment, be exaggerated. Let it once be established, as the settled doctrine of the Senate, and proclaimed to all the State legislatures, that the Senate will hereafter recognize and receive into its membership the appointee of a governor whenever the legislature, for any reason, has failed to elect a Senator, and you have given an incentive to aspirants for Senatorial honors, who may not be able to command the support of their party adherents in sufficient numbers to insure their election, to enter into a conspiracy with the governor, who may be a personal friend, to break up the legislature, prevent an election by that body, that the executive may draw to himself the power to make a temporary appointment, and thus reward his personal and political friend. Aspirants for Senatorial honors, should this rule be established, will be as greatly interested in securing a friendly executive as in carrying the legislature; for, with a friend in the executive chair, it is only necessary to secure a sufficient number of political adherents to prevent an election and force an adjournment, to insure his selection by the governor to a seat in the Senate, which he may retain so long as he can command the support of the executive.

More than this. Suppose a legislature to be overwhelmingly Democratic in the house, but Republican in the senate—on joint ballot, Democratic—and able to insure the election of a Democratic United States Senator; but the senate refuses to organize, and forces an adjournment without the election of a Senator; that the governor, a Republican, may appoint a Senator—his friend—and then, by refusing to convene the legislature, continue him in office until the next regular meeting of the legislature. The process is simple and interminable. Does not the Senate see that such a determination will introduce an element of discord and disorder which will surely bring disaster and disgrace? I do not mean to say that vacancies will not sometimes happen in the membership of the Senate if the established practice is adhered to. Possibly that may be so; but we "better endure the ills we have than fly to others that we know not of."

I am not alone in predicting disaster if this policy is adopted. The warning voice of the past comes to us with its counsel and admonition. If what we say to-day falls on deaf ears, I am sure the utterances of the great men who have gone before us will arrest your attention and command respect.

The great Senator Conkling said, in 1879:

If it should be the established law that wherever a legislature decided not to elect the power to fill the vacancy should revert to the executive of the State, the Senate and all of us must see how exposed the whole process of filling seats in the Senate would become, because the governor and his friends by cabal, intrigue, maneuver might so arrange that the legislature would decide not to elect, or would fail to elect, in order that the governor might gather to himself the power to fill the vacancy. The next legislature might decide not to elect, and so indefinitely within the six years the executive power of a State might usurp that which the Constitution deposits with the legislative power.

Senator Hill said:

The object of the framers of the instrument was to close the door to the possibility of the frauds to which the Senator from New York has alluded—and yet provide for the filling of casual vacancies; and therefore they put in the words of limitation which restrain the executive power to fill vacancies to cases of pure casualty that can not be anticipated, that can not be foreseen, and therefore where there can be no conspiracy or combinations to usurp the power on the part of the executive. * * * If you by any interpretation of these words allow the governor to appoint at the beginning of a term simply because the legislature for any cause has not filled the seat, do you not see that schemes may be resorted to to prevent the legislature from filling the seat?

Senator Hill is dead, but he speaks to this body to-day.

Whenever you admit that the governor can fill a vacancy which is brought about by the failure of the legislature to do its duty for any cause, you open the door to conspiracy and fraud to prevent the legislature from filling that vacancy. There is but one escape from that result, and that is to say that the language of the Constitution intended to confine the power of the governor to cases of casualty that the governor could not foresee, that schemers in the legislature could not foresee, that conspirators could not foresee, that nobody could foresee, and therefore nobody could conspire to bring about.

Senator Vance said:

The ambition of men which leads them often to the obstruction of the proper and legal election of Senators to this body in the hope of securing favors from a single man—the executive—should be rebuked, and they should be taught to know that this great tribunal will not make itself an accomplice in their schemes and combinations, if we wish to avoid scandals and to preserve the character and dignity of the United States Senate.

Senator Beck said:

It was thought that men who sought to come to the Senate should not appeal to the governor, before whom, perhaps, they were stronger than they were before the legislature, and use their influence or his to cause the legislature to fail to elect, so that the governor might exercise his patronage, and they obtain the place by reason of it.

Are the opinions of these distinguished lawyers and statesmen of no value?

CAN NOT CHANGE FRONT UNNOTICED.

Mr. President, we have reached a crisis in the history of the Senate fraught with the utmost peril, not only to the Senate, but to the country. The eyes of the nation are upon us. What we do to-day will not be overlooked or forgotten. We can not change front unnoticed. We are not sitting behind closed doors. The Senate can not afford to reverse its record of one hundred and eleven years. It can not afford to reject a claimant for a seat to-day and, on the same state of facts, admit another claimant to-morrow. It can not afford to give credence to the charge that the Senate of the United States is, after all, but a social club, where good-fellowship is a better credential than a certificate of election in conformity to law. In a word—we can not afford to do that which defies all precedent, strikes a fatal blow to the perpetuity of the Senate as constituted under existing forms of law, and shakes public confidence in the integrity of this body.

But "to this issue it has come at last." The long and unbroken line of precedents, stretching over a century of national history, builded by the considerate judgment and patriotic solicitude of the great men who have gone before us, strengthened by the approving judgment of the Senate but two years ago, which has stood through all these years as a bulwark against the assaults of partisan zeal and the more insidious assaults of favoritism, is at last to be broken down and demolished, and this great council of States exposed to political intrigue and the machinations of ambitious men.

Mr. President, when this work of demolition has been consummated, if it must be, and the people realize that the Senate, trampling under foot the precedents of a century, has solemnly adjudged that it will receive into its membership the appointees of governors whenever the legislature fails to elect or can be prevented from choosing a Senator; that governors may fill the seats in this Chamber whenever vacant for any cause, though themselves conspirators to produce vacancies; that the Senate itself, with the cooperation of State executives, will hereafter make up the membership of this body out of their personal or political friends, independent of the legislatures and regardless of the will of the people—when that time comes, I repeat, there will come with it the remedy, swift and complete. The people will not submit to it. They ought not to submit to it. They are wedded to representative government and they will not permit it to be subverted. There is yet a power mightier than Senates, more potent than Senators—a power that can make and unmake both.

And let me say to Senators that no sooner shall you establish the doctrine contended for by the minority than there will be a popular uprising in this country which no power can resist or suppress to take from State legislatures and governors all control over the election of Senators and lodge it with the sovereign people. Already thirty-four States, through their legislatures, have demanded it. The House of Representatives has repeatedly proposed it.

I implore Senators therefore to follow the beaten path of the century, in the footsteps of Ellsworth, Benton, Vance, Cass, Bayard, Hill, Davis, Garland, Cameron, Douglas, Mason, Blaine, Edmunds, Conkling, Carpenter, and the long line of illustrious men whose genius and learning illumines the way, and so save the Senate from public scandal and reproach, restore and preserve its ancient dignity, and insure the perpetuity of representative government.

ADJOURNMENT OVER GOOD FRIDAY.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Saturday next.

The motion was agreed to.

GOVERNMENT OF THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2355) in relation to the suppression of insurrection in, and to the government of, the Philippine Islands, ceded by Spain to the United States by the treaty concluded at Paris on the 10th day of December, 1898.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the present order of business be temporarily laid aside, that I may call up a resolution on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Dakota asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside in order that he may call up a resolution. Is there objection?

Mr. MORGAN. I object to that, Mr. President.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration——

Mr. MORGAN. I object to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama objects.

Mr. MORGAN. I want the regular business to go on.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I move, then, that the pending order of business be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. MORGAN. I make the point of order on that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That would hardly——

Mr. PETTIGREW. I withdraw the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business is before the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. I do not understand that any Senator desires to speak on the Philippine bill; and I have no objection to laying it temporarily aside and allowing the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW] to go on with his resolution; but I do not wish it to displace the unfinished business.

Mr. MORGAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 1783.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if I understand the motion of the Senator from Alabama, it would displace and supersede the unfinished business?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Undoubtedly.

Mr. LODGE. That I must oppose. I ask on that question the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of a bill the title of which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 1783) to provide for the construction of an interoceanic canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On this motion the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BURROWS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. CAFFERY], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. PETTUS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR]. If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. TURLEY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. TURNER]; and while I do not know how he would vote on this measure, if present, unless some of his colleagues can state, I shall withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MCMILLAN (after having voted in the negative). I voted not knowing that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LINDSAY], with whom I am paired, was absent. I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. QUARLES. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. SPOONER] is absent from the city by reason of illness in his family.

Mr. CULBERSON. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. CHILTON] has a general pair with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS], which I am informed has been transferred to the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS].

Mr. ROSS. I will state that my colleague [Mr. PROCTOR] is paired with the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY].

Mr. BACON. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. WETMORE], who, I understand, has not voted.

Mr. HARRIS (after having voted in the affirmative). I inquire if the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He has not voted, the Chair is informed.

Mr. HARRIS. Then I withdraw my vote, as I am paired with that Senator.

Mr. WARREN. My colleague [Mr. CLARK of Wyoming] was called away from here this morning; and I make the announcement that he will be absent for the remainder of the day.

Mr. BACON. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. MCMILLAN] and I have agreed to transfer our pairs, so that we can each vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. MCMILLAN. Under that arrangement I vote "nay."

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] and I have arranged for the transfer of our pairs, so that he and I may vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. WARREN. I vote "nay."

Mr. ALLISON. My colleague [Mr. GEAR] is absent from the Chamber to-day on account of illness. He is paired with some Senator, I do not remember whom.

Mr. MORGAN. He is paired with me. I was not aware of his absence. I withdraw my vote in the affirmative on account of the absence of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GEAR].

Mr. BUTLER (after having voted in the affirmative). I inquire if the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WELLINGTON] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that he has not.

Mr. BUTLER. I have a general pair with that Senator, and will therefore withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 15, nays 33; as follows:

YEAS—15.

Bacon,	Culberson,	Heitfeld,	Perkins,
Bate,	Daniel,	Jones, Ark.	Taliaferro,

Clark, Wyo.	Lindsay,	Proctor,

So the motion of Mr. MORGAN was rejected.

Mr. CARTER. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 3419) making further provision for a civil government for Alaska, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Montana asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill known as the Alaska bill.

Mr. MORGAN. I object, Mr. President.

Mr. CARTER. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill known as the Alaska bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Montana moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill known as the Alaskan bill. [Putting the question.] By the sound, the noes have it.

Mr. CARTER. I call for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BUTLER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WELLINGTON]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. CULBERSON (when Mr. CHILTON's name was called). My colleague has a general pair with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS], which I understand has been transferred to the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS].

Mr. HANNA (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Utah [Mr. RAWLINS]; and in his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK].

Mr. HEITFELD (when Mr. KENNEY's name was called). The Senator from Delaware [Mr. KENNEY] is necessarily absent. He is paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE].

Mr. MCMILLAN (when his name was called). The Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] and myself having agreed to an exchange of pairs, I am at liberty to vote; and I vote "nay."

Mr. MORGAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. GEAR]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. TURLEY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. TILLMAN (after having voted in the affirmative). I inquire if the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. THURSTON] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that he has not voted.

Mr. TILLMAN. Then I withdraw my vote, as I am paired with that Senator.

Mr. ROSS. I wish to state that my colleague [Mr. PROCTOR] is paired with the Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY].

Mr. WARREN. I have a pair with the Senator from Washington [Mr. TURNER]. I understand that a transfer of that pair has been proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. HARRIS], so that the Senator from Washington will stand paired with my colleague [Mr. CLARK of Wyoming], which will leave the Senator from Kansas and myself at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. HARRIS. I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 22, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—22.

Bacon,	Cockrell,	Harris,	Shoup,
Bard,	Culberson,	Heitfeld,	Taliaferro,
Bate,	Daniel,	Martin,	Vest,
Berry,	Fairbanks,	Money,	Warren.

So the motion of Mr. CARTER was rejected.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, some days ago I introduced a resolution of sympathy with the people of the South African Republics. I hoped that we might this afternoon temporarily lay aside the regular order of business, in order that that resolution might be laid before the Senate. There seems to be no good reason why that should not have been done. Inasmuch, however, as I have given notice that I would address the Senate upon this subject to-morrow, and as we are not to meet to-morrow, I will say what I have to say upon the subject now, the same as though my resolution were before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Dakota is recognized as entitled to the floor.

Mr. PETTIGREW addressed the Senate. After having spoken about half an hour,

Mr. PETTUS. I ask the Senator from South Dakota if it would be agreeable to him to finish his remarks when the Senate meets again? If so, will he give way to a motion that the Senate go into executive session?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I shall be very glad to do so with the understanding that I shall have the floor immediately after the routine morning business on Saturday.

[Mr. PETTIGREW's speech will be found entire in the proceedings of Saturday, April 14.]

Mr. PETTUS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. MORGAN. Before the motion is acted upon, I ask leave to offer an amendment to the bill now before the Senate. I ask that it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama withhold his motion for that purpose?

Mr. PETTUS. I do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama offers an amendment to the pending bill, which will be stated.

The Secretary read as follows:

Provided, That in conducting government in the Philippine Islands the President shall execute, in favor of the people there, the pledges of the Spanish Government in the treaty of Biac-no-Bato between Spain and the revolutionary party in Luzon, which treaty the Government of the United States recognizes as having been obligatory on Spain at the time of the acquisition of the Philippine Islands from Spain, so far as said treaty is consistent with the change of sovereignty over the same.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. MORGAN. I offer the amendment to the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is pending. It will be printed.

RUTHVEN W. HOUGHTON.

Mr. TELLER. I ask the Senator from Alabama to withhold the motion for a moment to allow me to call up a pension bill. It is a House bill, and there are reasons why it should be passed at once.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama yield?

Mr. PETTUS. Yes, sir.

Mr. TELLER. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4696) granting an increase of pension to Ruthven W. Houghton.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name Ruthven W. Houghton, late captain of Company I, Third Regiment New Hampshire Volunteer Infantry, and to pay him a pension of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SALMON FISHERIES IN ALASKA.

Mr. PERKINS. If the Senator from Alabama will kindly yield, I move that the bill (S. 2773) to amend sections 179, 180, 181, 182, and 183 of chapter 12, title 1, of an act entitled "An act to define and punish crime in the district of Alaska, and to provide a code of criminal procedure for said district," approved March 3, 1899, be recommitted to the Committee on Fisheries.

The motion was agreed to.

MRS. NARCISSA G. SHORT.

Mr. SULLIVAN. Before the Senate proceeds to the consideration of executive business there is a matter here that is very urgent. It is a Senate bill, and I ask that it be taken up and put on its passage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business will be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. SULLIVAN. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 1126) for the relief of Mrs. Narcissa G. Short.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Mrs. Narcissa G. Short, now of Carroll County, Miss., widow of Edward M. Short, who served as a soldier in the Mexican war in the company of Tennessee Volunteers made up in Fayette County, Tenn., commanded first by Capt. Joseph Lenow and subsequently by Captain Lacey, and to pay her a pension of $12 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LUNSFORD ELLIS.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator from Alabama allow me to have a little pension bill passed?

Mr. PETTUS. Yes, sir.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 3137) granting an increase of pension to Lunsford Ellis.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions, with an amendment, in line 8, before the word "dollars," to strike out "twenty-four" and insert "twenty;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Lunsford Ellis, late of Companies C and L, Eighth Regiment Provisional Enrolled Missouri Militia Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $20 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 8245) temporarily to provide revenues for the relief of the island of Porto Rico, and for other purposes; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. PETTUS. I move the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After ten minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Saturday, April 14, 1900, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, April 12, 1900.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. CHEADEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. TOMPKINS until Wednesday next, on account of important business.

DEPOSITARIES FOR PUBLIC MONEYS, INSULAR POSSESSIONS.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up for immediate consideration the bill (H. R. 9388) which has been unanimously reported from the Committee on Insular Affairs, and ask its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill called up by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to designate one or more banks or bankers in the Philippine Islands, and in the islands of Cuba and Porto Rico, as depositaries of public moneys, in the same manner as he now designates national banks as depositaries of public moneys under the provisions of section 5153, Revised Statutes of the United States; such banks or bankers thus designated to give satisfactory security by the deposit of United States bonds, or otherwise, for the safekeeping and prompt payment of the public moneys deposited with them and for the faithful performance of their duties.

The Committee on Insular Affairs recommend the adoption of the following amendments:

On page 1, line 11, strike out the word "or" and insert "and."

Page 2, after line 2, insert "Provided, That this act shall apply to Cuba only when occupied by the United States."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin for the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, there was an understanding between the chairman of the Committee on Insular Affairs and myself that if this bill should come up by unanimous consent in the House we might have an hour allowed for the discussion of it. My colleague, Mr. BREWER of Alabama, whom I do not see now in his seat, desires to offer an amendment. I can, however, offer the amendment for him in his absence, as I know his desire in that respect.

With the understanding, therefore, that I have an opportunity of offering the amendment for him and that there may be debate for the period named, I shall not object.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman ask unanimous consent that one hour's debate shall be allowed in the consideration of the bill?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia requests that an hour's time be given for the consideration of the bill just reported by the Clerk to be divided, as the Chair understands it, between the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] and the gentleman from Virginia. Is there objection?

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Speaker, before that, I desire to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CORLISS. Will this deprive us of the right to call for the regular order, which is the consideration of measures reported from the committees?

The SPEAKER. It will not.

Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I have no objection to make; but I wish to say in reply to what the gentleman from Virginia has said that I have a tacit understanding with the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BREWER] that, if he desires it, that side of the House can have forty minutes and this side twenty of the hour.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. That was my understanding.

The SPEAKER. The first question is, Will the House consider the bill? Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Unanimous consent is now asked by the gentleman from Virginia that one hour's time be allowed for the consideration of the bill, forty minutes to be occupied and controlled by the gentleman from Virginia and twenty minutes by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, probably it will be better for me to offer the amendment for Mr. BREWER before the gentleman begins his remarks. The amendment is this:

In line 3, page 2 of the bill, in the amendment proposed by the committee, after the word "Cuba," add the words "and the Philippine Islands."

That is an amendment to the proposed committee amendment on page 2, as will be seen, by inserting, after the word "Cuba," the words I have quoted.

The SPEAKER. It is understood that this amendment is pending for the action of the House?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Yes, sir.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, this bill has for its purpose the protection of the disbursing officers of the United States in the Philippines, in Cuba, and in Porto Rico and the safe-keeping of the public moneys—Government moneys—in their hands.

In some way inexplicable to me this bill has got to be known in certain quarters as the "Standard Oil bill." This morning I happened to mention incidentally that the bill would likely come up to-day, and a gentleman said, "Is that the Standard Oil bill?" I replied, "Yes; it is the Standard Oil bill."

Mr. PAYNE. I think you ought to name the member, so as to relieve the rest of us from suspicion.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I want to ask if there is any reason why this bill should not be applicable to Hawaii as well as to the islands covered by it?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The Committee on Insular Affairs has no jurisdiction of legislation pertaining to Hawaii.

Mr. GROSVENOR. But an amendment would be competent here if the House agreed to it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Possibly.

Mr. LOUD. They do not ask for it, do they?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. They have not asked for it.

Mr. PAYNE. The Secretary of the Treasury did not ask for it in Hawaii.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The Secretary of the Treasury has not asked to have it made applicable to Hawaii.

Mr. PAYNE. And he did ask for this. I think it is on account of the presence of the troops.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It is well for us to bear in mind that in the islands I have named, which came to us under the treaty of Paris, there are, properly speaking, two kinds of public moneys, one kind being that which is collected by the War Department. The islands are now under the control of the War Department. The revenues are collected and expended under the direction of the Secretary of War. He appoints his own collectors and disbursing officers and, in his discretion, takes security from them.

Now, this bill has nothing whatever to do with the money collected under the direction of the Secretary of War in administering the affairs of those islands. The money which is provided for by this bill is, properly speaking, Government money which has been in the Treasury of the United States and is returned to the islands and put into the possession of the disbursing officers, to be disbursed there for Government expenses, such as the pay of troops and the purchase of munitions of war, Army supplies, etc.

Now, how or why this came to be known the "Standard Oil bill" is utterly inexplicable. I have tried to ascertain how this rumor originated, what foundation there is for this charge, and after a patient investigation of two or three weeks I can not find one fact upon which to base it. The train of reasoning seems to be something like this: The gentleman who introduced this bill is Mr. SIBLEY of Pennsylvania; coal oil is found in Pennsylvania; the Standard Oil Company has to deal with coal oil; therefore this is the Standard Oil bill. [Laughter.] Now, to show how utterly ill founded that conclusion is, I desire to state that the origin of this measure is a letter written by A. F. Kenny, Paymaster-General in the United States Navy, under date of December 6 last, and directed to the Secretary of the Navy, Hon. John D. Long. I will read the letter:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU OF SUPPLIES AND ACCOUNTS,
Washington, D. C., December 6, 1899.

SIR: 1. The disbursements by the Navy in the Eastern Hemisphere are of great and constantly increasing volume. The proceeds of sales of bills of exchange being received in Mexican dollars, the bulk of weight of funds so obtained is very great. The last sale of exchange reported from Manila was by the fleet paymaster of the station for £50,000, equivalent in Mexicans to $500,000, weighing upward of 12 tons. The paymaster of the shore station at Cavite also has occasion to handle large sums, his rolls amounting to $120,000, Mexican, or more, per month.

2. There being no designated depository of public funds in Manila or Hongkong, pay officers are obliged either to make deposits on their own responsibility and in violation of law, or else to receive and care for large sums for the safe keeping of which there is no adequate provision. Either course involves risks that a disbursing officer should not be compelled to assume. In illustration, it may be stated that in 1896 on board the U. S. S. Boston, then in Chinese waters, the paymaster's safes being full of coin, a box containing four bags of Mexican dollars, $1,000 each, was temporarily placed near the cabin door, the captain's orderlies being charged with its supervision for safekeeping; and that one bag of Mexicans was abstracted therefrom while so stored, by some person or persons unknown. The most careful investigation failed to discover the time or means of the theft.

3. Section 3620, Revised Statutes, provides that—

"In places, however, where there is no treasurer or assistant treasurer, the Secretary of the Treasury may, when he deems it essential to the public interest, specially authorize in writing the deposit of such public money in any other public depositary, or, in writing, authorize the same to be kept in any other manner, and under such rules and regulations as he may deem safe and effectual to facilitate the payments to public creditors."

4. This subject is brought to your attention with an earnest recommendation that the necessary measures be taken for designating depositaries at Manila and Hongkong. The large disbursements at the latter port for ships' repairs and general purchases necessitate an authorized depositary there, as well as at Manila.

Respectfully,

A. S. KENNY,
Paymaster-General United States Navy.

The SECRETARY OF THE NAVY.

The next letter is one from the Assistant Secretary of the Navy, Charles H. Allen, in which he calls the attention of the Secretary of the Treasury to the letter which I have just read from the Paymaster-General, and requests that the Secretary of the Treasury, under section 3620 of the Revised Statutes, designate certain depositaries in the islands where these funds can be kept by the disbursing officers of the Government.

That letter is as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, December 8, 1899.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose herewith a copy of a letter from the Paymaster-General of the Navy, dated the 6th instant, in which he calls attention to the fact that, there being no designated depository of public funds in Manila or Hongkong, pay officers are obliged either to make deposits on their own responsibility and in violation of law, or else to receive and care for large sums for the safe-keeping of which there is no adequate provision, and recommends that necessary measures be taken for designating depositories at Manila and at Hongkong.

In view of the statements of the Paymaster-General, I have the honor to request that the necessary steps be taken, under section 3620 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, to designate depositories for public funds at Manila and at Hongkong.

I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully,

CHAS. H. ALLEN, Acting Secretary.

The SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

In reply to that letter the Secretary of the Treasury wrote the following communication to the Secretary of the Navy, under date of December 12 last:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., December 12, 1899.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 8th instant, in which you request that the necessary steps be taken under section 3620, Revised Statutes of the United States, to designate depositaries at Manila and Hongkong, for the convenience of Navy officers in keeping public funds advanced to them for disbursement.

In reply you are informed that there is no authority under existing law for establishing a United States depositary at Cuba, Porto Rico, or the Philippine Islands. When the public funds can not be kept with the Treasurer, an assistant treasurer, or a national-bank depositary, the only other manner the Secretary of the Treasury has authorized them to be kept is in the hands of a disbursing officer at his own risk, upon the recommendation of the head of the Department under which he serves. Officers of the Navy at the Philippine Islands are now keeping funds in this manner, and, it is understood, have been doing so when at distant stations since the organization of the Navy, and there appears to be no other way practicable at present, but the Department will endeavor to obtain from Congress legislation affording relief in the matter.

Respectfully,

L. J. GAGE,
Secretary.

The SECRETARY OF THE NAVY.

While Mr. SIBLEY was at the Treasury Department one of the subordinate officers there requested him to introduce the bill, now known as No. 9388.

Mr. Speaker, I think I will reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. BROSIUS. I should like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill one question about the bill.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Not out of my time, however.

Mr. BROSIUS. I do not know whose time it is.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman does not let it come out of his time, then the gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. How long will it take?

Mr. BROSIUS. Only half a minute.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I will yield to the gentleman, then.

Mr. BROSIUS. I want to know whether my friend thinks this bill is sufficiently guarded as to the character of the funds that shall go into these depositories? It does not name any particular fund. This does not except customs receipts, and I was wondering if it would be advisable to insert in the sixth line, after the word "manner," the words "and under the same limitations."

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. In reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROSIUS], I will say that I think it would be somewhat incongruous for us to make a law requiring the War Department to deposit the funds which it may collect in depositories there while those islands are under the control of the War Department. The funds are separate and distinct and should be kept so.

Mr. BROSIUS. I do not refer to any funds belonging to the War Department; but customs receipts do not go into the depositories; only internal revenue. I observe there is no discrimination here. I think it was intended to give to section 5153 full force and effect in those islands; but the question arose in my mind whether that was made certain by the language. It would be made entirely certain if we should insert the words "in the same manner and under the same limitations." That would carry there all the limitations of section 5153.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I will speak with the gentleman further about that matter. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BREWER].

Mr. BREWER. Mr. Speaker, the original bill did not carry with it the proviso as now attached. The original bill provided that these depositories should be in the island of Cuba and the Philippine Islands and Porto Rico. The amendment of the committee is to the effect that the provisions of the bill shall apply to Cuba only during the military occupation of that island by our troops.

Now, the amendment which I offered, or rather the amendment which was offered for me during my absence by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES], proposes to insert, after the word "Cuba," in line 3, page 2, the words "and the Philippine Islands," so as to provide that these depositories shall continue there only during the time of our occupation of the island of Cuba and of the Philippine Islands. Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to say a few words as to the purport of this amendment. I am not going to say anything particularly about the merits of the bill. I do not know anything about the motives which prompt it. They did not occur to me as evil, and I am loth to attribute any evil to any man without having some distinct evidence of it.

This amendment is offered to the end that in every possible way I may emphasize my aversion to the permanent retention of these remote lands and peoples and to that chronic warfare inaugurated there by President McKinley, for I do not consider it fair or just to lay this iniquity at the door of the Republican party as a whole when we find that some of the best and ablest men in it share in my repugnance to his course, and also find that a number of thoughtless men who claim to be Democrats are at one with the President on this subject. And I wish to say right here that so great and overshadowing do I regard the evils of this policy of conquest and spoliation that I would far rather give my humble support to any Republican who antagonizes it than to any Democrat who favors it.

In the present bill we give assurance by the proviso attached to it by the committee that we are not to retain permanent possession of Cuba. That amendment is well meant—meant to allay the suspicions of the Cubans, whom we have already taught to detest us by reason of our arbitrary rule there and our prolonged and now unnecessary military occupation of their country, and, well meant as is the committee's amendment, I must be allowed to say that we need somewhat more than mere words to convince me that if the President is left to himself he will ever release Cuba at all, but that the same perfidy already practiced toward the patriots of the distant Philippines will also be practiced in Cuba.

I say our conduct toward the Filipinos has been perfidious, and I say it without intending more than that such is my understanding of our conduct toward them, and without intending any disrespect to those who hold an opposite opinion. Without entering into the controversy which arose between Admiral Dewey and General Aguinaldo, one fact can not be questioned, and that is that the patriots in the Philippines took up arms and cooperated with us in order to release their country from foreign domination, just as did the Cubans. The Filipinos confidently expected their liberties and the freedom of their country.

I have not the slightest doubt that had they suspected bad faith on our part, had they believed that our rapacity would lead us to their continued enthrallment, they would have preferred the rule of Spain, a people of their own religious faith and race to a large extent and to whose methods they had been accustomed for three centuries.

They might have suspected last autumn, while the President was pouring troops into their country, before the terms of the treaty with Spain were agreed upon, that we had designs on their liberties and autonomy. When, on the 5th of January, 1899, before either country had ratified the treaty, the President ordered our arms to extend not alone to Manila, but over the whole archipelago, they began to realize his sinister designs.

When General Merritt ordered their forces out of Manila, they must have been confirmed in their fears; and when we fired the first shot, when we drew the first blood the night of the 4th of February, 1899, by killing an officer of their army, they could no longer be so foolish or so unmanly as not to resist the war which the President thrust upon them. Apart from this last overt act, all writers on international law concur in the axiom laid down by Puffendorf that "he is not the aggressor who strikes the first blow, but he who causes the first blow to be struck." It was thus that the President began his war on the 8,000,000 people of these remote lands.

That these millions of people were sold to us by Spain is a fact which can cut only a technical figure. The sale of human beings as so many chattels was abolished in this country thirty-five years ago as one of the results of a bloody controversy, which must have become known even in the harems of Sulu. I question the quality of that man's ethics who bases his sanction of the President's war in the Philippines on the bill of sale contained in the treaty of Paris. Certainly no Filipino consented to the sale of himself or is bound by that provision, and certainly the American people can not hold them to be bound by it while we declare that "all just government is based on the consent of the governed." But you may say we acquired Louisiana and other regions in the same way—a fact which, without going into its details, you must agree, gave us no moral right to wage war on their peoples till they had consented to be thus disposed of.

But even that treaty, whereby it is alleged we bought these people from a country which exercised no sway over two-thirds of them—even that treaty need not bind us to retain them. No sensible man would keep a property which was a dead expense to him. No child would put its hand on a hot stove and keep it there because it had put it there. Some fifty years ago we had possession of the capital of Mexico; sixty-five years ago our flag was over a captured town in Sumatra, and a century ago it was over the city of Derna, in North Africa; but we came away from these places because there was no profit in retaining them.

Now, we are taxing our people at the rate of $200,000,000 a year to retain this distant archipelago, whose whole revenues amount to $12,000,000 a year, and this revenue largely made up of a poll tax on every adult woman, of licensed lotteries, and the licensed cockpits which General Otis has undertaken to abolish; cockpits which yield a revenue of more than $150,000 a year in the town of Manila alone. Does any business man see any profit in spending $200,000,000 a year to make ten or twelve million?

At the close of Mr. Cleveland's Administration the revenues of our Government were $326,000,000. That was for the fiscal year 1896. What were they for the last fiscal year? Five hundred and fifteen million dollars! But it may be said the war will not go on, and that our budget will not require such extraordinary burdens on our people. Well, we have now about 65,000 men in the Philippines; war has been going on there for more than a year; and in his letter of resignation, dated the 3d of this month, General Otis declares that "a large repressive military force must be maintained for some time."

Nay, more; only last Friday there was a combat 5 miles from Manila, and the dispatches say the Filipinos were in uniform and too strong to be followed. The same dispatch tells us that General Young in north Luzon and General Bell in south Luzon are calling for more men, and represents also that combats have just occurred in the islands of Samar and Panay. "We hold only that part of the country that is within the range of our guns," an officer wrote home a few days ago in a private letter. This, too, just at the end of the winter season, when the weather and roads are best for man-hunting, and now, the hot season is at hand, to be followed by the frightful humidity which prevails from June to November.

I said man-hunting. That is about all the possible profit the American people will ever get out of this war Mr. McKinley is waging. We have killed the buffalo and other game of this country; we have pensioned off such Indians as we have failed to destroy, and now we must have a vast area for the purpose of hunting down men. Certainly there is no question of economics in it.

Now, sir, I doubt if the American people realize the enormity of the task Mr. McKinley has undertaken. The Philippine Islands are larger in their total area than the islands of Britain. There are four times as many Filipinos to the square mile as there are Americans. They are on the other side of the world. If but a fraction of their numerous population resist Mr. McKinley's scheme of conquest they will give employment to "the large repressive military force" General Otis says must be maintained there "for some time." Besides, these islands are tropical and unhealthful in every part of the thousand miles of latitude over which they extend.

Do such facts as these commend the retention of the islands to the judgment of business men or taxpayers of any sort?

Now, sir, besides, what Republican who remembers that Boss Tweed pillaged our commercial metropolis for several years will say that we are more fit to govern and civilize the Filipinos than they are themselves? What Democrat who complains of trusts and monopolies or of Senator HANNA can wish us to carry such a government to these distant people? Here, under the very eaves of this Capitol, in this very District, which is the heir of all our civilization, within the past month both the Republican and Democratic primaries are charged as having been carried by fraudulent methods.

Not only that, but we hear of negroes who are counted out in the South because they wish to vote, and negroes who are shot down in Illinois because they want to work. This is the boasted civilization which we are to carry to the other side of the world, and to administer by the hands of carpetbaggers.

And what hope can we hold out to these people if they submit to us? Can we promise them a popular form of government? Did we not, only yesterday, refuse a popular form of government to the people of Porto Rico by requiring the President to appoint one house of their legislature? And this when even the Spaniards had granted them complete autonomy. We even denied the Porto Ricans representation in Congress, when they have, for twenty years past, had their members in the congress at Madrid. What encouragement is this to the Philippines to submit?

For my part, I have lived under the lawless domination of aliens, and I know what it means. They pillaged the States of the South for many years: men who came among us as adventurers, with lust in their eyes, poverty in their purses, and hell in their hearts. What better sort are we to give to a civic government in the remote islands Mr. McKinley is so anxious to conquer?

It is not so much on their account, sir, that I wish to get out of those islands. It is on account of our own people; the evils which will inevitably follow a policy of conquest and spoliation, of bloodshed and taxation, of foreign entanglements and domestic moral decadence.

I deny that we should put both feet into a vise because we have one there; I deny that we should throw good money after bad money; I deny that two wrongs or a perpetuated wrong can ever make a right. Let us get out of those islands and leave those millions of people to govern themselves.

Let us believe that they are as much entitled to freedom as we are, and for one I believe they are fully as moral. What right have we, who in our morning litany call ourselves "sinners," or "miserable sinners," and who must believe that it is only by the vicarious blood of another that we are redeemed from the damnation of hell, to rise up with these admissions on our lips and say we are better than the Filipinos?

The amendment I offer refuses to contemplate a continuance of Mr. McKinley's destructive policy. It recognizes our present occupation as temporary, and I would be glad to see it end this very day by the withdrawal of our efforts to subdue a people who are asking the boon of self-government, on which we too pride ourselves. And yet, as I said, it is the interests of our own people we shall consult most by getting out of those islands.

The great question of our own interests should constrain us, even if it be not the love of Christ; and I refuse to believe that the American people, when they once understand that they are plucking apples of Sodom, will tolerate the President's war. They will not, as Medea in the Greek tragedy, "lift upon their golden locks this garniture of death." [Applause.]

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COX].

Mr. COX. There is one point that has not been discussed in connection with this bill which it seems to me should have some attention before we vote upon it; and I shall be glad to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to it. I think, of course, that the provisions of the bill should apply as well to the Philippine Islands as to Cuba during the time that the military forces are in occupation there. But it is not on that point I wish to speak.

We all understand that under the national banking system when we establish a depository for public funds it must be a national bank; and the law provides on its face that a bank thus made a public depository shall secure the deposits thus made by United States bonds "and otherwise."

That is to say, the deposits are to be secured by United States bonds and otherwise. Now, let me call attention to how that phrase "and otherwise" is going to operate. There are no national banks now on those islands. Suppose some large bank—for instance, a national bank of the city of New York—should establish a branch bank (that would be the effect of it) on one of those islands, and then should put up its securities in order to act as a depository of the United States. Now, the difficulty would arise in this way: The national banks are under the supervision, inspection, and control of the United States. These banks there will not be, because there are no national banks there. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, inasmuch as these banks are to be private institutions, it ought to be imperative that they deposit United States bonds for the security of the money that is put in the banks; and I think that language "and otherwise" ought to go out of this bill. That is the suggestion I desire to make.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to this bill in toto, and shall be equally opposed to it if the amendment which has been proposed is adopted. I do not believe that any real necessity exists for this proposed legislation. The troops of the United States have occupied Porto Rico, Cuba, and some parts of a portion of the Philippine Islands for nearly two years; and if the disbursing officers of our Government have been seriously inconvenienced for the lack of public depositories in which to keep their moneys, if any of the funds of the Government have been lost by reason of the fact that such public depositories did not exist in those possessions, acquisitions, or colonies, or whatever our Republican friends may be pleased to call them, the report which accompanies this bill does not disclose that fact.

The distinguished chairman of the Committee on Insular Affairs who presented that report has read to the House a letter from some disbursing officer in the Philippine Islands in which it is stated that the writer has suffered some inconvenience and that some small package of money in his keeping had been abstracted; but even if that be true, it does not show that any great public necessity for this legislation exists.

Mr. Speaker, even if these public depositories were provided, the funds that would go into them would be only such as are sent from the United States with which to pay off the soldiers stationed in Cuba and the other islands named. From the very necessities of the case the disbursing officers must keep the cash by them. Soldiers are paid off in cash, and checks and drafts can not, I imagine, be used for that purpose. The taxes and other public revenues collected in these islands are entirely under the control of the War Department and can be deposited now in any banks selected for that purpose by the President. No legislation by Congress is needed to enable the Secretary of War to take care of the funds thus derived, and none is asked for that purpose.

It has been, as I have said, nearly two years now since we occupied these islands. Certainly it can not be the intention of the Administration or of the Republican party to retain possession of Cuba much longer. The people of that unfortunate island have been solemnly assured that it was our purpose to give them a free and independent government, and they have the right to expect that we will fulfill that promise. Instead of providing banks in which to deposit money to pay our soldiery in Cuba, we should be preparing to withdraw that soldiery and to turn over the island to its inhabitants, who are its rightful owners. Such legislation as is proposed in this bill is notice to the people of Cuba and to the world that we have no present intention of standing by our pledges and redeeming our promises.

The gentleman from Wisconsin in charge of this measure tells us that it has been characterized as the "Standard Oil bill." He could imagine, he said, no other reason for that characterization than that it had been introduced by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY], that the Standard Oil Company had its habitat in Pennsylvania, and that there was oil produced in Pennsylvania. I think if the gentleman had made the careful investigation which he claims to have made, he would have discovered that there was more solid foundation for the belief that this bill is in the interest of the Standard Oil Company than that which he has undertaken to give. He might have discovered, perhaps, had he carried his investigations far enough, that the popular belief as to this bill is indeed well founded.

Can the gentleman have forgotten that a short time ago the charge was made upon the floor of this House that a prominent official connected with the National City Bank of New York had actually written a letter to the Secretary of the Treasury asking that his bank might be designated as a depository of public funds, and inviting the Secretary's attention to the fact that the list of directors of that bank contained the names of those who had rendered great political aid toward the election of President McKinley in 1896?

The gentleman can not fail to remember that this charge was not only made, but actually proven, since the letter itself was produced and read. It was stated, too, and has never been denied, that the Standard Oil Company, the greatest trust the world has ever seen, controls and practically owns the National City Bank. It is well known, too, that among its directors are to be found the names of such trust magnates as those of Rockefeller and Havemeyer. It is not, then, as the gentleman from Wisconsin suggests, that because the author of this bill and the Standard Oil Company happened to reside in the same State that this bill has been characterized as the Standard Oil Company's bill, but for the far weightier reason that that mighty trust is not only in the oil, the manufacturing, and the transportation business, but is also in the banking business in New York City and seeking, through the political influence of its enormously wealthy and powerful bank directory, to handle and to use the vast funds of the United States Government.

It has been convicted in one instance of an attempt to influence the Secretary of the Treasury by calling attention to the fact that among its directors are to be found the names of men who have rendered great service to the Republican party. The Standard Oil Company is interested, maybe, in having this measure become a law. At any rate, it is in the banking business and is desirous of securing all the deposits of Government money which it can control through political and other influences; and if the public think this a Standard Oil Company bill I am not prepared to say the public is mistaken.

It is not necessary for me to point out the means by which banks and bankers contribute to the success of political parties. They make no appeals to the judgment and reason of those whom they would convert to their way of thinking. They contribute money to campaign committees—money with which to corrupt voters and to purchase votes. They appeal to cupidity rather than reason. Moreover they give their money invariably where they expect to receive the largest returns. If this bill becomes a law, and the President is permitted to name the depositaries of public funds in Cuba, who can doubt but that such banking institutions as the National City Bank will have their applications favorably considered? The political claims of such men as Rockefeller can not and will not be ignored, believe me, gentlemen. They have not found the Republican party to be an ungrateful party in the past.

Mr. Speaker, as I have already said, I do not believe there is any necessity for this legislation. I do not believe that the officers of the Government have experienced any great inconvenience on account of the absence of designated banks in Porto Rico, Cuba, and the Philippine Islands as public depositaries. We have gotten along without them for a long time, and let us indulge the hope that in the near future there will be no need of them, at least in Cuba.

I hope this bill will not be passed. It will have the effect of retarding the efforts that should be made to set Cuba free. The relations between our troops and the people of Cuba are becoming hourly more and more strained, and unless something is done, and speedily done, to remove the existing friction, I verily believe there will be a serious outbreak and the shedding of much blood. Should our continued and unjustifiable occupation bring about such a serious condition of affairs, the responsibility will rest upon the Administration and the Republican party.

The only honorable, just, and honest course for us to pursue is to live up to both the letter and the spirit of our plighted word. Instead of providing in a more permanent and efficient way for caring for the funds of the United States in Cuba, I am in favor of redeeming our pledges made to her people and withdrawing at the earliest possible moment every American soldier now upon the soil of that island. The passage of this bill will, I much fear, retard rather than hasten a consummation which, so far as I am concerned, is most devoutly to be hoped for.

Mr. Speaker, these are some of the reasons which induce me to oppose the passage of this measure.

I will now yield for the question which the gentleman from Tennessee desires to ask me.

Mr. GAINES. This bill says that the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to designate one or more banks. I want to ask the gentleman if there are any banks in these islands?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. There is at least one bank in Porto Rico, there are banks in Cuba, and there may be a bank in Manila. I am informed that as to Cuba the people who are conducting the banking business there reside, for the most part, in the city of New York, and that the capital of the Cuban banks is chiefly owned in New York.

Mr. GAINES. Was there any evidence before the committee to show that there are banks in the Philippine Islands; and, if so, who the officers are?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. So far as I know there was no evidence showing what banks, if any, there are in the Philippine Islands. I may say, however, that I was not present when the Secretary of the Treasury appeared before the Insular Committee. He may have given some evidence upon that subject of which I know nothing. I know of no bank in Manila.

Mr. GAINES. It says that the Secretary is authorized to designate banks, and that presupposes that there are banks there.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I have no information on that subject.

Mr. BREWER. There is one bank in Porto Rico, but I do not think there are any banks in the Philippines.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I yield time enough to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FITZGERALD] to offer an amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 9 insert "with the further proviso that all such banks or bankers shall pay at least 2 per cent per annum on all moneys thus deposited."

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as I may have remaining to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FITZGERALD].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has ten minutes remaining.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Then I will yield five to the gentleman from Massachusetts. I did not know there was so much time remaining.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the bill before the House at the present time is one of the most important that has come before the present Congress; and it seems to me, in view of the transactions that have come to light between the Treasury Department and some of the national banks throughout the country, that the present bill which seeks to inaugurate and establish new depositaries of public money in our new dependencies, ought to be taken advantage of to make a departure in the method of giving moneys to different institutions without exacting any interest from them.

The members of the House are perfectly well aware, as stated by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] a few moments ago, that the moneyed interests of New York and other large cities throughout the country have been manipulating the stock markets for the past year with funds deposited by the Secretary of the Treasury in so-called Government depositaries which are none other than favored national banks.

More than $100,000,000 are deposited in different depositaries throughout the United States to-day, at the dictation of the Secretary of the Treasury, and this money is used by the bankers and by the heads of the different syndicates operating in the stock market, to loan out from 3 to 125 per cent. It is well known that many men have been impoverished and made practically beggars by the machinations of these men, and it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that it is time to call a halt to this policy, and not attempt to augment it by establishing any such system of operations in connection with the government of our new dependencies.

The amendment which I proposed a few moments ago states that the United States Government shall receive at least 2 per cent from these men who obtain this money. It is a well-known fact, and I think the chairman of the committee will admit it, that there is nothing in this bill that will prevent the loaning of the money deposited by the United States Government to individuals as well as to banks. There is no attempt made to limit the rate at which that money will be loaned, and there is nothing to prevent the banks or banker from loaning this money at 3 per cent; and, perhaps, if the money market is cornered, at more than 100 per cent, and yet they receive this money, without the payment of any interest, from the United States Government.

And so, Mr. Speaker, I sincerely hope that if the United States Government intends to establish this form of banking, and to inaugurate another system of government depositaries in the Philippine Islands and Porto Rico and in Cuba, this House will at least insist that the Government shall get some return.

I refer again to another defect in this bill which it seems to me is an inauguration of a new policy. I believe that under the present banking law the naming of institutions as depositaries for public funds is restricted to national banks and institutions of that kind. In this bill they have included bankers, so that any person who may designate himself as a banker, who is willing to deposit Government bonds under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may exact, is enabled to get thousands and hundreds of thousands and perhaps millions of dollars of Government money to use as he pleases.

Mr. GAINES. Why can not they send safety-deposit vaults over to these islands for the use of these Government officers?

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. The gentleman from Tennessee suggests safety-deposit vaults could be bought by the Government and sent to these islands for the purpose of storing Government funds. It seems to me that that is a wise suggestion. If there is any danger of the loss of Government money sent to any of these places as pay for the soldiers or for any other purpose, safety-deposit vaults could be established without any trouble, and thus another money scandal avoided. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that under no conditions should this House of Representatives allow private bankers to go into the banking business under the authority of the United States, and secure the opportunity to get possession of millions of Government money without the payment of any interest.

A bill as important as this should receive the most careful consideration of this House, and should be debated longer than the time allowed for the consideration of this measure.

More scandals and jobbery have developed in connection with the conduct of national banks in this country the past year than from almost any other source, and we ought to go very slow in establishing banking institutions in our new possessions.

Two per cent on the deposits of the Government in national banks and kindred institutions in the United States to-day would add a first-class armored cruiser to the Navy every year. Why spend the people's money in this manner?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. Eight minutes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY].

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, as the time at the disposition of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] is so short, I do not feel justified in occupying any part of it. Therefore I yield back the time he has so kindly yielded to me. I supposed he had more time.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] whether he proposes to exhaust his time now?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I would be glad to reserve my time.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I prefer to have the gentleman go on and use his time.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I understood that the gentleman from Wisconsin yielded three minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY].

The SPEAKER. That has been yielded back.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I accepted the time originally under a misunderstanding; I thought there was more time on this side.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES].

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Speaker, this bill provides "that the Secretary of the Treasury shall be authorized to designate one or more banks or bankers in the Philippine Islands to be Government depositories." Mr. Speaker, the Constitution, according to the idea of the majority here, is not in operation in the Philippine Islands; and if that assumption is correct, and the President, unless he changes front again, so treats it, the "bankers" in whose care we would place this money would not be restrained by any of the restrictions found in that instrument; whereas, if this money were left in the hands of the American soldier, who is a citizen of the United States and who is sworn before he buckles on his armor, or afterwards, to support the Constitution of the United States, he would be restrained by the limitations of that instrument.

Another proposition: Are these bankers or the officers of these banks to be American citizens, or Filipinos, or whom? There is no limitation in that respect in the bill.

Another point: These banks or bankers, if intrusted with this money, must provide vaults in which it is to be cared for. Why should not the United States provide a safety vault such as defies the thieves and robbers of this country, and send it over there and put the American soldier in charge of the American money, instead of placing that money in the hands of Philippine bankers to be let out to those people, allowing them thus to be "skinned," as is being done in Cuba?

Let me read a few lines as to the indebtedness of this unfortunate island of Cuba. I quote from the Evening Star, of this city, of April 9:

CUBA'S FINANCIAL STATUS—PROPERTY ON THE ISLAND MORTGAGED FOR MORE THAN VALUE.

HABANA, April 10.

The Nuevo Pais says:

"Taking $31,800,000 as the annual assessed income of urban and rural properties of the island, according to the assessment of 1887, and capitalizing it at 10 per cent, $318,000,000 would be obtained as the total value of the properties of the island. Subtracting $248,000,000, the amount of the existing mortgages on said properties, about $70,000,000, the value of the unencumbered property, would remain. This, however, does not take into account the properties destroyed during the war, which far exceed that amount. It would therefore appear that the actual value of the properties does not equal the amount of the mortgages existing on them."

"The actual value of the property" in Cuba, says the Star, an Administration paper, "does not equal the amount of the mortgages upon it." If the public money is deposited in banks there, the rate of interest on loans of such money should be limited by law. This bill makes no such provision.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GAINES. I ask unanimous consent to insert in my remarks a short newspaper clipping relating to Cuba and Porto Rico.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. GAINES. The extracts referred to are as follows:

[St. Louis Republic, April 9, 1900.]

FOR CONQUEST.

There is something ominous in the growing sentiment of hostility to this Government which has now assumed such proportions in Cuba as to give cause for apprehension of a revolt against American control in the near future.

To the many thousands of Americans whose hearts thrilled with pride at the glorious significance of our war against Spain for the liberation of Cuba this unhappy prospect will seem one of peculiar bitterness in its meaning of cruel disappointment and humiliation. It should be impossible that relations between a great power such as ours and a little and weak people such as the Cubans, whom we have freed from the bondage of Spanish tyranny, shall assume that perverted phase where fear of a second conquering and a second oppression lead the weaker race to hopeless and costly antagonism to the kindly guidance of the stronger.

Especially is this deplorable in view of the fact that a Cuban outbreak against American authority will give to the advocates of annexation in this country exactly the opportunity for which they have been waiting. It will be urged that the Cubans are unfit for self-government. A hatred of that people will be sought to be aroused in American bosoms. Under the influence of this spirit the Cuban dream of national independence will vanish forever. Their island will be annexed as American territory, to which the beneficent operation of the American Constitution does not extend, though it become necessary to exterminate an entire generation of Cuban patriots.

The outlook in Cuba is not pleasant just now. It begins to look as if the plot of imperial land grabbers is developing in line with the crafty desires of the plotters. There is shame for Americans in the thought.

I clip this from the Nashville American of April 9, 1900:

"813,937 MEN WITHOUT A COUNTRY.

"Deserted by Spain, denied American citizenship by the Republican majority in Washington, the inhabitants of Porto Rico present the spectacle of 813,937 men without a country. Of course some of them are women, some children, and some 200,000 negroes. But whatever their sex, whatever their age, whatever color may have been burned upon them by the sun of heaven, they have no flag to which they can appeal, no government to which they must bow in love, in gratitude, and in loyal devotion.

"This is the meaning of the Senate bill."

And this indictment is drawn by the Chicago Times-Herald, a Republican newspaper, and in times gone by a sturdy supporter of the Administration. Could anything stronger have been penned?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] has a few minutes remaining.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND].

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, whatever may be the necessity or use of this bill as a law with reference to Porto Rico or the Philippine Islands, it seems to me there is no use in the world for it and no excuse for it with reference to Cuba. We have been getting along in the occupation of that island for a good many months without any such depository as is provided for here. The world knows, and we ought to remember, how we came into possession of that island and how we declared that our occupancy of it was to be for a temporary purpose—to pass it over to control of its people.

This, Mr. Speaker, is but another straw to indicate the way the wind blows from certain quarters. It is but another indication of a purpose to get hold of Cuba, or of everything in Cuba that is worth having, and deprive the people there of their independence instead of securing it to them in accordance with our many promises. Instead of legislating to establish American institutions in the island of Cuba, we ought to be legislating, sir, for American departure from the island of Cuba.

And let me say to gentlemen who may hope, by indirect means, by pretense or otherwise, to acquire possession and control of the island of Cuba permanently, that their course is building up and will build up such a sentiment of hostility to Americans and American institutions there that this acquisition will be exceedingly difficult, if desirable at all; and if the island be thus acquired, the holding of it will be a work of immense care and cost.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, it is not a little astonishing——

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield just for an instant?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What is the gentleman's wish?

Mr. COX. Before the gentleman proceeds that he will allow me to suggest a simple question to him.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Very well.

Mr. COX. I only want to call your attention to that bill, that while the authority is given to establish depositaries for the public moneys in these islands, there is no limitation in the bill, as there is in the national-bank act, as to the interest to be charged for the money loaned out by such banks. They are able, under the provisions of this bill, to charge any amount which they please. They may charge 1 per cent or 200 per cent. There is no limitation upon them.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I was proceeding to state that it was not a little astonishing that a plain, commonsense, business proposition can not be discussed in a plain, businesslike way on the floor of this House. It is evident that the political opinions of gentlemen are to be dragged into these questions and political harangues indulged in every time any proposition touching the islands now under the control of this Government is before the House; at least, whenever such proposition is presented by a Republican member on this floor.

So far as the criticism of the gentleman from Tennessee is concerned, the words "and otherwise" in the bill are the exact words of section 5153 of the Revised Statutes, and they have been in it ever since that section was enacted. So that his criticism in that regard is of no avail. Secretary Gage told our committee that in the administration of the Treasury Department no Secretary had ever taken from a Government depository any kind of security except Government bonds and that no Secretary would ever accept any other. This has been the practice and this the language of the statute for twenty-five years or more.

So far as the banks are concerned, one gentleman suggests that he understands there is a private bank in the Philippines. There is a bank in the Philippines capitalized at $10,000,000, which has branches in Hongkong, Bombay, London, and Paris, and something in the nature of an agency in the city of New York, which will accept the Government deposits and deposit Government bonds as security. The Secretary of the Treasury, in speaking to the Committee on Insular Affairs on that subject, said that there would be no money in it so far as the bank itself is concerned, because the public moneys would be in its possession for a very limited time, but that it would be more or less a benefit to the bank to have the name of being a Government depository; that, so far as he could understand, is all there would be of benefit in it for the banks themselves in these islands. Now, the same thing is true in Cuba and Porto Rico.

There is another kind of money which the disbursing officers are obliged to receive under the statute, and that is the savings of the troops. Last year we appropriated about $92,000 to pay the interest on the savings of soldiers which had been deposited in the United States Treasury. Under the law such money draws 4 per cent interest, and the disbursing officers are required to take this money from the soldiers and to receipt for it. It is not a matter of discretion. They are compelled to take it, and under the law as it now stands they do it at their own risk.

This bill has its inception in the letter which I read from the Paymaster-General of the United State Navy, telling of the hardships which, under existing conditions, obtain, so far as the paymasters of the Navy are concerned, in the Philippines. We wish to have this hardship done away with. We wish to have the power given to the Secretary of the Treasury to designate certain banks there as places where these disbursing officers can, after they have drawn the money from the subtreasury here, deposit it rather than carry it around. The Secretary of the Treasury said that sometimes thousands of dollars would have to be kept in the actual manual possession of these disbursing officers, or otherwise, technically, they would be guilty of embezzlement, unless the Secretary of the Treasury had designated some bank where the money could be deposited. He said that they never had, and did not now propose, to designate any bank as a depository there, because the present law limits depositories to national banks, and there are no national banks there, and there is no law under which he can demand security from any other bank in the islands.

Mr. GAINES. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. GAINES. You have explained about the word "banks." Of course we understand what that word means; but you do not say anything about "bankers." You draw a distinction in your bill between banks and bankers, and the banker of course would be the private individual.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It is entirely immaterial, provided they give the same security that the other bank would give.

Mr. GAINES. Can not the United States throw around our officers over there the same safeguards that a private banker would have—that is, safes and vaults, the sword, etc?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. We do not know of any disbursing officer who is prepared to give the security in the shape of United States bonds that the banks there say they are willing to give.

Mr. GAINES. But the soldier is bound under oath to obey the laws of the United States, and the private banker is not or may not be.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Is a paymaster going to carry a vault around in his trousers pocket?

Mr. GAINES. No; and he does not carry the money in his trousers pocket. If he did, it would not have been stolen. It has been stated here that some of it has been lost or stolen.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. But he gives security.

Mr. GAINES. I am opposed to letting this money out to private bankers. That is what I am getting at. We can protect and secure our officers there just as well and better than we can a private banker.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I am astonished at the question the gentleman asks.

Mr. GAINES. You did not explain it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The disbursing officers draw on the subtreasury of the United States, say at New York. The money is taken out there, and under the law, if they deposit it in any bank in these islands without a permit, they are technically guilty of embezzlement. If they deposit it subject to their own order, they are technically embezzlers, and therefore they deposit it at their own risk. If they carry any cash about with them, they do it at their own risk. We can not have four or five officers guarding a safe and another one off with the funds paying out the money. We have got to have a place where the paymasters can deposit funds and where they will be protected, just the same as in the United States of America we designate a national bank, and the national bank is a depository and gives security in the shape of United States bonds.

Mr. GAINES. Do you think the money would be safer in the hands of a private banker than it would be in the hands of our officer over there, if you give him the same kind of a vault to keep it in?

Mr. PAYNE. But the bankers put up bonds as security.

Mr. GAINES. And the soldier his life, if he does wrong.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. If the paymaster put up the same bonds and had as many men guarding the safe all the time as an ordinary banker, the money would be just as safe; but a paymaster of the United States Army is compelled to travel from one place to another——

Mr. GAINES. Does not the paymaster give a bond?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Vaults are not portable.

Mr. GAINES. Why, they have them down in my country and elsewhere, and they are perfectly safe.

Mr. LOUD. You can not draw on a safe deposit vault, can you?

Mr. GAINES. We draw on the safe deposit of the House—just outside the door—for our salary, and it is perfectly safe there, and there has never been any defalcation.

Mr. HOPKINS. Oh, yes; there have been defalcations in the past.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. The gentleman from Tennessee is mistaken. There have been defalcations right there.

Mr. GAINES. Oh, yes; so is the Lord's Prayer disobeyed every day.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I want a separate vote on the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 11, after the word "bonds," strike out the word "or" and insert the word "and."

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment, and the amendment offered to the amendment.

"Provided, That this act shall apply to Cuba only while occupied by the United States."

Amend the amendment: Page 2, line 3, after the word "Cuba," insert "and the Philippines."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. BREWER. Division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 85, noes 79.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I call for the yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 121, nays 135, answered "present" 11, not voting 83; as follows:

Mr. WACHTER with Mr. SMALL, for one week.

Mr. ALDRICH with Mr. BURNETT, until April 21.

Mr. OTJEN with Mr. BRENNER, until April 20.

Mr. GILLET of New York with Mr. CAMPBELL, until Monday.

Mr. HILL with Mr. UNDERHILL, for balance of week.

For this day:

Mr. JENKINS with Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana.

Mr. BABCOCK with Mr. MCALEER.

On this vote:

Mr. BURLEIGH with Mr. DAVEY.

Mr. DRISCOLL with Mr. GLYNN.

Mr. JOY with Mr. LENTZ.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey with Mr. LESTER.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I voted from force of habit. I am paired with the gentleman from New York, Mr. UNDERHILL, and I desire to withdraw my vote and be marked "present."

Mr. HILL's name was again called, and he answered as above recorded.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Was the gentleman present and listening for his name when it was called?

Mr. LITTLE. I was.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will call the gentleman's name.

Mr. LITTLE's name was called, and he voted as above recorded.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will now report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FITZGERALD].

The Clerk read as follows:

With the further proviso that all such banks or bankers shall pay at least 2 per cent per annum on all moneys so deposited.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts) there were 54 ayes and 62 noes.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays. [Cries of "Oh, no, no!"] I will withdraw the demand, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FITZGERALD] withdraws the demand for the yeas and nays; the noes have it, and the amendment is disagreed to.

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the reading of the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LEVY].

"That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to instruct the collector of customs for the island of Cuba to deduct from the monthly receipts of said island of Cuba 25 per cent of the total amount collected, and to transmit said amount to the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, which amount shall be placed to the credit of the island of Cuba. And such monthly transfers of 25 per cent of the receipts of the island of Cuba shall continue until the total amount expended by the United States on behalf of the island of Cuba shall have been paid, or until such other provisions for the settlement of the indebtedness of the island of Cuba to the United States shall have been made between the Government of the United States and the authorities of the island of Cuba."

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order on that amendment that it is not germane.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin makes the point of order that the amendment is not germane.

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Speaker, I think this amendment is germane; it relates to the island of Cuba and its financial situation. The bill before the House is upon the financial question in these islands, and I think this amendment is germane.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In the opinion of the Chair, the amendment relates to an entirely different subject than the subject of the bill, and the point of order is sustained. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts) there were—ayes 69, noes 68.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was engrossed and read the third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Division, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 122, nays 111, answered "present" 9, not voting 108; as follows:

So the bill was passed.

The following pairs were announced:

For this session:

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH with Mr. WILSON of South Carolina.

For this day:

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey with Mr. CUMMINGS.

Mr. CANNON with Mr. NAPHEN.

On this vote:

Mr. ACHESON with Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama.

Mr. BARTHOLDT with Mr. BURLESON.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, I voted "aye" on this bill, but as I am paired with my colleague from Texas, Mr. COOPER, I desire to withdraw my vote and answer "present."

Mr. HAWLEY's name was again called, and he answered "present."

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

On motion of Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

PENSION CLAIMS OF DEPENDENT PARENTS.

Mr. CORLISS. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the call of committees.

The Clerk proceeded to call the committees.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER (when the Committee on Pensions was called). I desire to call up the bill (S. 2836) to repeal section 4716 of the Revised Statutes so far as the same may be applicable to the claims of dependent parents of soldiers, sailors, and marines who served in the Army or Navy of the United States during the war with Spain.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 4716 of the Revised Statutes be, and the same is hereby, repealed so far as the same may be applicable to the claims to pension of dependent parents of soldiers, sailors, and marines who served in the Army or Navy of the United States during the war with Spain.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I ask that the report on this bill be read. I think it will make this case as clear as could be done by any remarks of mine.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is this bill called up on the call of committees?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is.
Mr. RICHARDSON. Is it on the House Calendar?
The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is.
Mr. RICHARDSON. Ought it not to be on the Union Calendar?
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will examine the bill.
Mr. RICHARDSON. It seems to me that the bill should have been referred to the Union Calendar. I do not know that I shall make any point of order, but I want to get at the facts. I could not hear the bill read. I ask that it be read again.
The bill was again read.
Mr. RICHARDSON. From what I have heard in regard to this bill, I do not care to make any point.
Mr. GAINES. This bill gives to soldiers who fought in the war with Spain, and who may also have served in the Confederate army, equal rights with other soldiers.
Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. This bill removes the prohibition of section 4716 of the Revised Statutes.
A MEMBER. What is that?
Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. That section prohibits the dependent parents of men who were in the Confederate service from receiving pensions. This bill removes that prohibition, so that the dependent mothers of such soldiers may have their claims for pensions adjudicated at the Pension Department.
Mr. GILBERT rose.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LOUDENSLAGER] yield?
Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Yes, sir; I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GILBERT].
Mr. GILBERT. Mr. Speaker, this bill, as I understand it, merely removes the disability which is imposed by existing law for having rendered service in the Confederate army during the war of the rebellion. For example, in the Eighth Kentucky district, a young man by the name of Brewer, a graduate of West Point, went as a lieutenant with our army, and was killed in the Philippine Islands last summer. His father made application for pension, he being a worthy old man and dependent entirely upon the boy for his support. I filed his application in the office of the Pension Department here, and he was debarred from obtaining it solely because of the fact that he had been a soldier in the Confederate army. But for that disability, which, as I understand it, this bill seeks to remove, he would, as the dependent father of the young soldier, have been entitled to pension.
Now, if I am correct, the purpose of this bill is merely to remove that disability and allow dependent fathers and mothers or other dependent relatives under existing pension law to obtain pensions as other pensions are granted, notwithstanding the fact that the father may have served in the Confederate army. Is that the purpose of the bill?
Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. That is the purpose of the bill.
Mr. BARTLETT. That is correct.
Mr. GILBERT. That being true, I hope every Democrat and every Republican on the floor will vote for the bill.
Mr. RIDGELY. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?
Mr. GILBERT. Certainly.
Mr. RIDGELY. Does not the gentleman think that this bill is so manifestly just that every man in this House on all sides should and will support it?
Mr. GILBERT. I think so.
Mr. RIDGELY. And we all think so.
Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman from New Jersey allow me to ask him a question?
Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Certainly.
Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Is there any law now on the statute books refusing the same rights to the widows and dependent families of Confederates who have served in the Spanish war as are granted to the families of all other soldiers?
Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. The section that this bill seeks to amend—the section of the statute—relates to dependent parents of soldiers and repeals the restriction which was heretofore imposed by the law.
Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. But is there any other law on the statute books prohibiting the granting of pensions to the family of a soldier who served in the United States Army during the Spanish-American war if previously he had served in the Confederate army? If so, I hope all disabilities of this kind will be removed.
Mr. RIDGELY. Do I understand that this does not remove the disabilities now existing as to pensioning the widows of Confederate soldiers who subsequently served in the war with Spain?
Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I will say, Mr. Speaker, that if this bill becomes a law it removes that bar as far as dependent parents are concerned.
Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman cause to be read the statute proposed to be repealed by this legislation?
Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I should be very glad to have it read, but it is not before me. I have stated, however, briefly, the purpose of it, and the report sets out clearly what is contemplated by the bill.
Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I think if the gentleman from New Jersey will make an explanation of the bill, so that the House may understand what is proposed to be done, it will be found not to be objectionable and will meet the approval of all members.
Mr. HOPKINS. Let the bill be read, or the report, or the gentleman can make a statement giving the purposes of the bill.
Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Speaker, section 4716 of the Revised Statutes prohibits the granting of the benefits of the pension laws to the dependent parents of soldiers who had previously served in the Confederate army. Now, a large number of applications are being made, and are pending at the Department, to grant pensions to soldiers who served through the war with Spain (who had served previously in the Confederate service), for the benefit of their dependent parents who have made application to the Department, but were refused pensions under the prohibition existing by this section 4716.
The whole effect and purpose of the pending bill therefore is to remove that prohibition of the section so far as it applies to dependent parents of those who served in the Spanish war.
Mr. GIBSON. Will the gentleman allow a question?
Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Certainly.
Mr. GIBSON. Why not repeal this whole section entirely? Why not make a total repeal of it at this time? I ask the gentleman from New Jersey to allow me to offer an amendment repealing section 4716 in toto, so as to allow all of those men who served a while in the Confederate army and who afterwards joined the Union Army to come in and get a pension under existing law.
Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I can only say to the gentleman that this matter does not come before my committee.
Mr. GIBSON. But it comes before the House.
Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Do not begin by pensioning deserters from the Conferate army.
Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I ask the previous question on the bill to its passage.
The previous question was ordered, under the operation of which the bill was ordered to a third reading; and being read the third time, was passed.
On motion of Mr. LOUDENSLAGER, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

S. 2. An act to provide for the construction, maintenance, and operation, under the management of the Navy Department, of a Pacific cable—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

S. 248. An act for the relief of Winslow Warren—to the Committee on Claims.

S. 2438. An act to establish a fish-hatching and fish station in the State of West Virginia—to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. BAKER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 8345. An act temporarily to provide revenues and a civil government for Porto Rico, and other purposes; and

H. R. 1092. An act to set apart a portion of the Arlington estate for experimental agricultural purposes, and to place said portion under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of Agriculture and his successors in office.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I desire to inquire if the conference report on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill is on the Speaker's table?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is.

Mr. BINGHAM. I desire to present that conference report. I ask that the reading of the report be dispensed with and that the statement of the House conferees may be read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the reading of the report be dispensed with and the statement be read?

There was no objection.

The conference report is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8347) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 17, 22, 40, 44, 45, 52, 53, 55, 62, 63, 64, 79, 80, 86, 89, 93, 94, 105, 106, 116, 124, 135, 169, 184, 200, 201, 202, 203, 204, and 246.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 2, 3, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 18, 19, 20, 21, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 41, 43, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 54, 56, 58, 59, 60, 61, 65, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 81, 82, 83, 85, 86, 87, 90, 91, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100, 101, 102, 103, 104, 107, 109, 115, 117, 118, 119, 120, 121, 122, 123, 125, 126, 127, 128, 129, 130, 131, 132, 133, 134, 135, 136, 137, 138, 139, 140, 141, 142, 143, 144, 145, 146, 147, 148, 149, 151, 152, 153, 154, 157, 158, 159, 160, 161, 162, 164, 165, 166, 167, 168, 169, 170, 171, 172, 173, 175, 177, 178, 179, 180, 181, 183, 185, 188, 191, 192, 193, 196, 197, 198, 205, 206, 207, 208, 209, 210, 211, 212, 214, 215, 216, 217, 218, 219, 221, 222, 223, 225, 226, 227, 229, 230, 231, 232, 233, 234, 235, 236, 237, 238, 239, 240, 241, 242, 243, 244, 245, 248, 249, 250, 251, 252, 253, 254, 255, 256, 257, and 258, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 1: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: At the end of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "Five Civilized Tribes of Indians;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 4: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 4, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$122,300;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 5: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 5, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the number proposed insert "twenty-one;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 6: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 6, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$37,800;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 23: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 23, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$15,620;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 42: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 42, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$6,060;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 51: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 51, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "chief of division, $1,500;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 57: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 57, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$5,080;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 66: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 66, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$5,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

HENRY H. BINGHAM,
J. A. HEMENWAY,
L. F. LIVINGSTON,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit to the House that this is a final agreement upon all the provisions of the bill. If any gentleman desires to make any inquiries, I will, with pleasure, answer.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I should like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania how much this conference report increases the original appropriations in the bill as it left the House?

Mr. BINGHAM. Two hundred and eighty thousand dollars, in round numbers, and if the gentleman wishes I will state that the large items covering that increase are $50,460 for the Senate, in their own administration of their body; some $66,600 for the Library, increase over the House allowances; some $20,000 for the Hydrographic Office, with the establishing of a rule whereby no moneys for clerical force shall be taken from any appropriation in the bill other than that specifically indicated for clerical force.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to explain the change of the law again. I did not understand his last statement.

Mr. BINGHAM. The Hydrographic Office——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. In reference to the change of clerks. As I understand, the bill makes a new law.

Mr. BINGHAM. If the gentleman has reference to the House provision whereby there is control of the expenditures, I would say the Senate conceded those controlling paragraphs.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But, as I understand——

Mr. BINGHAM. So that the Hydrographic Office, as the Senate and House understand it, is fully provided for in its present efficiency, together with the establishment of an additional office at Galveston, Tex. If the gentleman will allow me to proceed——

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I should like to ask a question upon that point. I understand that this conference report in no way cripples the present equipment of the Hydrographic Office.

Mr. BINGHAM. In no way whatever. All the stations of the Hydrographic Office are provided for as under current law, with the addition of the hydrographic office at Galveston, which is a new office, and we excluded from the bill the Senate amendment for a hydrographic office in the Philippines.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I understand the provision to which the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has referred is simply a prohibition upon that office from paying clerks out of the appropriation for the pay of the Navy, which they have heretofore done, in complete violation of the law.

Mr. BINGHAM. That is correct.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. And the law is changed in no way.

Mr. BINGHAM. In no way whatever.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. They are simply admonished to observe the law in the future.

Mr. BINGHAM. And the efficiency of the Bureau continues.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. In every way.

Mr. BINGHAM. In every way. Now, again, we reenact and continue the Court of Private Land Claims for another year, at an expense, the same as under the current law, of $41,500. We give to the Interior Department an increase in their stationery account, which the exhibit of deficiencies heretofore allowed make necessary, amounting to $7,000, the amount including the administration of the Civil Service Bureau.

In view of the large increase of work in the Post-Office Department, we give the estimates which the First, Second, Third, and Fourth Assistant Postmasters-General have asked, supplemented by the request of the Postmaster-General, and in view of the additional fact that the exhibit this year indicates that, by virtue of the increase of the revenues of general postal service, there will be a deficit of only a little over $4,000,000. We felt warranted in making the administration of the several divisions of the Post-Office Department as effective as possible.

Along the line of the bill there are many minor changes of $200 and the allowance of additional clerks, but these four or five items cover largely the great body of the increases of the Senate and concurred in by the House.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania what items are increased in the expenditures—for what purpose the money is to be expended where the increase is to maintain the Senate and Library? Those are the two largest items, I understand.

Mr. BINGHAM. The only way in which I can answer the gentleman in connection with the Senate is to say it covers: "Enrolled Bills," "Geological Survey," "Railroads," "Pacific Railroads," "Pacific Islands and Porto Rico," "Philippines," "Relations with Cuba," "Interoceanic Canal," "Transportation," and "Sale of Meat Products," etc. They are clerks.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Is it additional clerks to those which are already provided?

Mr. BINGHAM. Miscellaneous items, exclusive of labor, $25,000; the Senate has increased it to $50,000.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is for the Senate?

Mr. BINGHAM. Let me make this statement. It runs all along the line of appropriations for the general administration of the Senate. Some years ago it was a common rule of this House to enter into contention with the Senate in reference to the administration of that which pertained to the Senate so far as subordinate force is concerned.

It never had but one result, and that was that the House finally yielded. I think for the last six or eight years that I have had general charge of this bill we have accepted the conclusion that the Senate had the right to determine what its subordinate force should be, they according to the House the same right; and while we, at this conference, to some extent resisted this appropriation in our general debate, it was felt that however much we might discuss it the result would be the same.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Still, with a view to necessary economy, whether we can succeed or not, I think it is just to the country, even when we agree to the Senate amendment, that the gentleman should state how much increase there is for employees and those expenditures that the House conferees did not think necessary.

Mr. BINGHAM. The increase in the sum total is $50,460.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Is that all for employees?

Mr. BINGHAM. This increase, as the report says, is for employees, the contingent fund, and miscellaneous expenses of the Senate, as proposed by the Senate.

Increases on account of employees and for contingent expenses of the Senate proposed on the legislative, etc., bill by Senate amendments are as follows:

1 committee clerk, from $2,100 to $2,220	$120
3 committee clerks, from $1,800 to $2,220	1,260

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, in reference to the increase for the Library. For what purpose is that to be used?

Mr. BINGHAM. I would state that the Committee on Appropriations resisted, in the bill that it submitted to the House and passed, a large number of items of increase of force and salaries submitted by the Librarian. The hearing was a long one, lasting almost an entire morning in the subcommittee on the legislative bill. We so adjusted the bill that we felt we had given the Librarian the full amount to wisely administer the Library.

He, however, was given a full hearing by the Senate, and the Senate took issue with the House on the plans of development that the Librarian intended to operate upon, broad plans to make this great and magnificent Library useful in every respect. We gave in the House bill the full allowance for the copyright department that the Librarian asked for, as that brings to the Government revenue, and should be up to date in administration and work. In the items of catalogue we cut them down and reduced in many other paragraphs of the bill. He submitted to the Senate that on the basis of his estimates for the catalogue the time as to years would not be great, but that upon the allowances of the House it would cover many years—perhaps fifteen years—to complete.

The Senate gave him his estimates for the catalogue. The Librarian also outlined his future work in his general examination, the broad field that he proposed and the field of usefulness he hoped the Library should fill. The Senate acceded to these requests. The House objected to the increases of salary of subordinate force and the Senate yielded; so that in effect your committee, recognizing the thorough training, large experience, and marked integrity of Mr. Putnam, together with the confidence entertained for him by the Congress, especially in his good judgment, we found and concluded that we should yield to the Senate, and I am of opinion valuable results will follow.

Of course, I can not go into the details, but we have given the Librarian, except in the increase of salaries, all he asked Congress for in the Book of Estimates, believing that it was best for the future usefulness of the Library. And in that connection let me state that while we did not feel that it should be put upon this bill, there was an indication in the committee that the usefulness of the Library, even though it is open from 9 o'clock in the morning until 10 o'clock at night, was only filling a limited influence, but that it became the duty of the Librarian to see how it could be more largely extended than under the old rules which now govern it.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether the House concurred in the amendment inserted by the Senate increasing the salary of the Librarian to $6,000 per year.

Mr. BINGHAM. We give the Librarian $6,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. That is, the $1,000 that was added by the Senate is still retained?

Mr. BINGHAM. We have accepted the Senate amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. That is a matter of justice, because Mr. Putnam came to Washington with the understanding that he should have that amount. He is, in my judgment, the best qualified man in this country for that position, and I am glad that this increase has been made.

Mr. BINGHAM. There seemed to have been an understanding that the salary Mr. Putnam would receive as the Librarian of the Congressional Library should not be less than the salary he had been receiving as librarian in Boston.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. The understanding was that Mr. Putnam's salary was to be made $6,000, and while we disliked to lose his valuable services in Boston we felt honored that a Boston man had been selected for this great office.

Mr. CUSHMAN. I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Is there a provision in the conference report granting an increase in the expenditure for the Yellowstone National Park?

Mr. BINGHAM. The amount was increased from $1,000 to $1,500.

Mr. ALLEN of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask my colleague a question, whether or not, notwithstanding all the resistance upon the part of the House to extravagance and unnecessary expenditures upon the part of the Senate, is the House, as one of the leading branches of this Government, responsible to the people, to yield this question altogether to the Senate, and let them spend just as much money as they please for the future, without any effort on our part? Is it not time that we should call some sort of a halt on the Senate, even at the expense of defeating an appropriation bill, and call the attention of the country to this unnecessary extravagance?

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I move, if there are no other inquiries, the adoption of the report, and on that I call for the previous question.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BINGHAM) there were—ayes 67, noes 48.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Tellers, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I would like to know from the gentleman from Alabama what is his objection?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think it is time that we should make the appropriations.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the demand of the gentleman from Alabama for tellers.

The question of ordering tellers was taken.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Ten gentlemen rising, not a sufficient number, and tellers are refused. The ayes have it, and the conference report is agreed to.

On motion of Mr. BINGHAM, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Mr. CORLISS. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to nonconcur in the Senate amendments on the District of Columbia appropriation bill and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order has been demanded.

Mr. CORLISS. I will yield to the gentleman from Vermont.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Vermont asks that the House nonconcur in the District of Columbia appropriation bill and ask for a conference.

The motion was agreed to.

The Chair appointed the following conferees on the part of the House: Mr. GROUT, Mr. BINGHAM, and Mr. ALLEN of Mississippi.

ELECTION OF UNITED STATES SENATORS.

Mr. CORLISS. The regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the call of committees.

The Clerk proceeded with the call of committees.

Mr. CORLISS (when the Committee on Election of President, Vice-President, and Representatives was reached). Mr. Speaker, I call up House joint resolution No. 28, proposing an amendment to the Constitution providing for the election of Senators of the United States.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following amendments be proposed to the legislatures of the several States, which, when ratified by three-fourths of said legislatures, shall become and be a part of the Constitution, namely: In lieu of the first and second paragraphs of section 3 of Article I of the Constitution of the United States of America, the following shall be proposed as an amendment to the Constitution:

"SEC. 3. The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen for six years, and each Senator shall have one vote. These Senators shall be chosen by the legislatures of the several States unless the people of any State, either through their legislature or by the constitution of the State, shall provide for the election of United States Senators by direct vote of the people; then, in such case, United States Senators shall be elected in such State at large by direct vote of the people; a plurality shall elect, and the electors shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature

"When vacancies happen, by resignation or otherwise, in the representation of any State in the Senate, the same shall be filled for the unexpired term thereof in the same manner as is provided for the election of Senators in paragraph 1: Provided, That the legislature of any State may empower the executive thereof to make temporary appointments until the next general election, in accordance with the statutes or constitution of such State."

This amendment shall not be so construed as to affect the election or term of any Senator chosen before it becomes valid as a part of the Constitution.

Mr. RUCKER rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Michigan yield?

Mr. CORLISS. I do not wish to yield at present. I will directly.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask a question for information.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Michigan yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. CORLISS. Yes, for a question.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER], who is a member of the committee, has a minority report.

Mr. CORLISS. The gentleman and I have a full understanding, and it is not necessary to fix any time; but after I conclude my preliminary remarks I understand the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER], who desires to offer an amendment.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is what I wanted to inquire about.

Mr. CORLISS. We have a definite understanding.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. But the amendment which the gentleman wishes to offer is in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. RUCKER. I understood that the substitute ought to be offered now and be pending.

Mr. CORLISS. I have no objection to the gentleman's offering the substitute now.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution providing for the election of the United States Senators by popular vote.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That in lieu of the first paragraph of section 3 of Article I of the Constitution of the United States, and in lieu of so much of paragraph 2 of the same section as relates to the filling of vacancies, and in lieu of paragraph 1 of section 4 of said Article I in so far as the same relates to any authority in Congress to make or alter regulations as to the times or manner of holding elections for Senators, the following be proposed as an amendment to the Constitution, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as a part of the Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States:

The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, who shall be elected by a direct vote of the people thereof for a term of six years, and each Senator shall have one vote. A plurality of the votes cast for candidates for Senator shall be sufficient to elect. The electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislatures, respectively.

The time, place, and manner of holding elections for Senators shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof.

When a vacancy exists in the representation of any State in the Senate, occasioned by death, resignation, or otherwise, the executive authority of such State shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancy: Provided, That the legislature of any State may empower the executive thereof to make temporary appointment until the next general election in said State for the election of Representatives in Congress, at which time such vacancy shall be filled by election as provided herein.

This amendment shall not be so construed as to affect the election or term of any Senator chosen before it becomes valid as a part of the Constitution.

Mr. RUCKER. Now, Mr. Speaker, I would like to know if the substitute is considered as pending?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Certainly; the gentleman from Michigan consents that it shall be pending.

Mr. RUCKER. I would like to ask if we can not agree as to some division of the time?

Mr. CORLISS. I submit that we can dispose of this matter this afternoon. I am perfectly willing that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] should occupy one-half of the time. I do not think it is necessary to make any agreement, but we can occupy the time of the House between now and adjournment, and I am willing that the time should be equally divided. I understood from the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] that that would be satisfactory.

Mr. RUCKER. I understood that each gentleman on the committee could arbitrarily control one hour; but I now learn that is a mistake and that they can not do it. This side would like to have two hours.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. What is the proposition?

Mr. CORLISS. I understand the gentleman from Missouri wants a division of the time. It seems to me it is unnecessary. I have no objection that the gentleman from Missouri shall have as much time as I occupy on this side, but I ask that the matter be disposed of this afternoon.

Mr. RUCKER. Gentlemen on this side want to be heard on this bill, and have asked for more time than we can have between now and adjournment. There is only about an hour and a half remaining.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rules of the House the gentleman from Michigan is entitled to an hour and the gentleman from Missouri to an hour unless in the meantime the previous question is called for.

Mr. BREAZEALE. I want to suggest to the gentleman from Michigan that more time than an hour and a half is desired on this side.

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Speaker, I ask that we proceed now regularly with the consideration of this measure; and if gentlemen do not obtain to-day all the time they may desire, I am perfectly willing that the bill go over to some other day. I will not move the previous question until debate has been concluded satisfactorily to the other side.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CORLISS] is recognized.

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Speaker, I yield to no man a higher appreciation and reverence for the Constitution of my country. It was conceived through the genius of our forefathers, inspired by divine love of humanity, individual liberty, and the welfare of mankind. It has been the enduring monument upon which not only the fabric of our national life rests, but the rock upon which monarchies have been wrecked and governments based upon the sovereign power and will of the people have been builded.

I am not unmindful of the difficulties attending any effort to amend this marvelous instrument. The proposition presented in the present joint resolution is neither new nor novel in our legislative history.

The question whether the United States Senators should be elected by the people was a subject of discussion in the convention which framed the Constitution, and has recently repeatedly engrossed the attention of Congress.

With the meager population, scattered wealth, and primitive conditions of our country at the formation of the Government, I am not surprised that those illustrious men should have finally united against the better judgment of Madison, Hamilton, Wilson, and others, and placed the power to choose Senators in the legislatures of the several States.

They had no warnings to guide them against the evils, intrigues, and maneuvers of corporations and political bosses of modern times. No subject has engrossed the attention and aroused the indignation of the people more during the past twenty years than the conduct of State legislatures in the election of Senators.

The object of this amendment is to place in the hands of the people of the respective States, if they so elect, by constitutional or legislative enactment, the right to express by direct vote the will of the citizen in the selection of Senators.

It will be observed that the proposed amendment broadens and extends the sovereign right of the people of the State by placing in their power the right to either continue the present method for the election of United States Senators by the legislatures or by a direct vote of the people, when in the judgment of the people of the State such method would correct the existing evils and insure to the State her full representation in the United States Senate.

This provision preserves the unit of power in the State, in no way affects the rights of a State or the power of the Senate, and maintains the fundamental principles of the Constitution.

The chief concern of all good governments is the welfare and happiness of the people. This can best be secured and preserved through the agency of the direct action of the citizen as the sovereign.

The fundamental principle of our form of Government is based upon the idea that it derives "its power from the consent of the governed."

The people in 30 different States—the required two-thirds—have most emphatically expressed their wish with reference to this amendment by the adoption of resolutions demanding action by Congress. Permit me to read two or three of recent date. They are most significant:

[House joint resolution No. 9.]

Joint resolution concerning the election of United States Senators by a direct vote of the people of each State.

Resolved by the general assembly of the State of Ohio, That the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America be memorialized as follows: The general assembly of the State of Ohio respectfully requests the Congress of the United States to submit a constitutional amendment providing for the election of United States Senators by a direct vote of the qualified electors of each State of the Union. The general assembly believes that such an amendment to the national Constitution will result in each State having at all times a full representation in the national Senate, will prevent protracted and disturbing contests for membership therein, and will prevent all attempts to influence improperly or corruptly the selection of members to the national Senate. The general assembly believes that as all political power in the United States comes from the people, that the sole right to select all legislative officers should by the Constitution be vested directly in the people.

Resolved, That the governor is hereby respectfully requested to forward a duly authenticated copy of this memorial (with the vote upon its passage), under the great seal of this State, to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from this State, in order that the same may be brought to the attention of the Congress of the United States.

CHARLES H. BOSLER,
Speaker pro tempore of the House of Representatives.
ASAHEL W. JONES,
President of the Senate.

Adopted February 3, 1898.

Resolution adopted by the legislature of Pennsylvania, providing for the appointment of a committee to confer with the legislatures of the other States of the Union, regarding an amendment to the Constitution of the United States which shall provide for the election of United States Senators by popular vote.

Whereas it is evident, judging by the tone of the public press, as well as by the resolutions of the State legislatures, and the resolutions passed year after year by the national House of Representatives, that a majority of the American people desire a change in the Constitution whereby they may elect the President, Vice-President, and United States Senators by direct popular vote: Therefore, be it

Resolved (if the senate concur), That a committee of five, two from the senate and three from the house, be appointed to confer with the legislatures of other States of the Union with the view of bringing about the submission of an amendment to secure the desired result; this committee to report to the legislature in 1901, and not to incur expenses to exceed $500 for the two years.

JERE B. REX,
Chief Clerk of the House of Representatives.

The foregoing resolution concurred in.

E. W. SMILEY,
Chief Clerk of the Senate.

Approved the 6th day of April, A. D. 1899.

WILLIAM A. STONE.

The amount authorized to be expended is written in figures instead of letters. The amount is $500, and I approve the resolution with this understanding.

WILLIAM A. STONE.

[House joint memorial No. 2.]

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the legislative assembly of the State of Montana, respectfully represent that we believe there is a general desire upon the part of the legal voters of the State of Montana that United States Senators should be elected by a direct vote of the people, and that the election of United States Senators by the legislative assembly, under the present provisions of the Constitution and laws of the United States, retards and delays the business of the sessions seriously.

Therefore your memorialists respectfully request you to take such steps as may be necessary to secure such amendments to the Constitution and laws of the United States as will provide for the election of United States Senators by a direct vote of the people, and we urge our Senators and Representatives in Congress to use their best endeavors to secure such amendments.

The framers of our Constitution did not intend to permit vacancies to exist in the Senate. The unit of power in the Senate is the State, represented by two votes. All States, large or small, without regard to population, wealth, industrial or commercial influence, stand on an equality in the Senate. Yet, through the present vicious methods of electing Senators, vacancies have existed for nearly one-half the time during the history of our country in consequence of the failure of the State legislature to elect.

There are to-day four vacancies in the Senate as a result of the present pernicious method, arising from the intrigues and maneuvers of ambitious men and bossism in State legislatures; and it seems to me, from the evidence already presented to the Senate, that another vacancy may soon be created.

Think of it! Five great States of this Union with their influence in the Senate severed in twain and the unit of power only half represented! It is like a one-legged man trying to walk without crutches, or a captain trying to navigate a side-wheel steamer during a storm with one wheel and the rudder.

Judging by the resolutions recently adopted, the people of Pennsylvania, Delaware, California, Utah, and Montana have enjoyed all the fruits of the present vicious method of electing Senators they desire.

Vacancies in this House, in the judiciary and executive branches of the Government are kept constantly filled, while in the Senate, where a single vacancy destroys the principle of equality among the States, vacancies of recent years are almost constant, and the sacred principle of the Constitution thereby violated.

We boast of our Christian civilization, and our people have been taught by the Lord to pray, "Lead us not into temptation," and yet the Constitution in its present form spreads in the pathway of the members of the legislature a temptation through which many true men of merit are forced to defeat and the glory and honor of a Senatorship snatched by unfair means from the hands of the people.

Take from the legislatures the election of Senators and you will destroy the most potent power through which corporate influence now holds its sway.

In many States the entire time of the legislature has been occupied with Senatorial elections and the people of the State humiliated by not only a failure to elect, but by the failure of all legislation in the interest of the people.

The present method of electing Senators carries with it the insinuation that the people are, for some unknown reason, unfit to make choice of their lawmakers in the United States Senate.

Members of this House are compelled to depend upon the direct suffrage of the citizens. Why should Senators object to this plan? Are they afraid of their constituents? Do they fear to trust the judgment of the people? If so, I submit they are unfit to represent the people.

This amendment proposes to allow the citizens of each State to elect whether they will choose Senators by the present method—through the legislature—or by direct vote of the people.

I am aware that some of the members here prefer to make the law uniform in each State. Why? Because it seems more harmonious to their mind. We know that the people in at least 30 out of the 45 States want a change, but have no expression from the other 15 States. They seem to be content with the present law, and I submit that this amendment, which places the responsibility for the change with the people, is based upon the fundamental principles of our Government.

Why should the people of Vermont or Massachusetts be compelled to change their plan of electing Senators because the people of the States of Pennsylvania and Montana demand a change? Why should the members of this House assume to dictate to the people of Massachusetts or New Hampshire, and compel them to comply with a method of electing Senators desired by the people of Pennsylvania or Michigan?

We have tried the other plan, and it has failed in the Senate. Now, let us grant to the people of the thirty States who have asked for a change the power to reach their Senators.

Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to find gentlemen on the other side of this House insisting upon the uniform method proposed by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER]. What is the matter with these gentlemen? Are they afraid to trust the people of the respective States? Have they forgotten the record of their party leader, William Jennings Bryan, whom they blindly follow into the realm of anti-sound money, anti-tariff, anti-trust, anti-expansion, and anti order, ownership, and peace in the Philippines, who in the Fifty-third Congress, before the gentleman from Missouri became a member of this House, proposed substantially my resolution, and under his leadership every member on that side of the House voted for the amendment?

What would the gentleman from Missouri say, as well as the others on the other side of this House, if we should enact a uniform law with reference to the election of members of Congress? In my State all citizens are permitted to cast their votes for members of Congress, while in many of the Southern States they are deprived of their suffrage because they can not read and write. If it is wise that Senators should be elected uniformly in all the States by the people, why should we not enact a national law that will extend, as provided by the Constitution, to the citizens of all States the right to cast their votes for a member of this House and have it correctly counted?

In Vermont and in many other States the judiciary are appointed by the legislature, while in my State, and in many others, they are elected by the people. Why not legislate with reference to this subject, and make the laws of each State uniform?

In some States the franchise is extended to persons not citizens, persons who have only declared their intention to become citizens, while in my State and in many other States none but full citizens are permitted to vote. Why not pass a law making this uniform throughout all of the States?

This uniform method, which seems so desirable and harmonious to some of the members of this House, is simply an echo of the Senatorial whiplash and will be used to defeat this measure in the Senate. While I think the gentlemen who advocate the proposed amendment are sincere, let me warn them that they are endeavoring to place this measure in such a condition as to excite the bitter opposition of many of the members in the Senate. There is a certain character of Senatorial courtesy existing in the Senate, and the Senator from Pennsylvania, whose people have asked for this amendment, will not trespass upon the rights of his colleague from New Hampshire, whose people are satisfied with the present method.

Mr. Speaker, through the kindness and generosity of Mr. J. S. McLain, editor of the Minneapolis Journal, I am able to illustrate the importance of this constitutional amendment. There is nothing more effective on the human mind or heart than an object lesson.

Here [at this point a large cartoon was, by direction of Mr. CORLISS, exhibited to the House] you can behold the pot-bellied members of the State legislature baiting their hooks with the gold fish in the Senatorial brook.

For over a century they have been casting their tempting bait into this limpid pool until nearly all the trout, bass, and other game fish have been caught or frightened away and nothing but the big-mouthed suckers and bullpouts remain.

The Senatorial honor, in some States at least, has become besmirched with these polluted waters until nothing short of political blackleg vaccine virus will destroy the dangerous Senatorial germs that now infest the wily fisherman.

The modern combinations of capital that threaten the welfare and happiness of the people are slight evils compared with the gigantic trust and monopoly held by these greedy fishermen for over a century.

Uncle Sam has become aroused, and his boys have donned their wading boots and propose to brave this Senatorial brook and propagate again the game fish for Senatorial diet.

Mr. BROSIUS (numerous members having gathered in a group to examine the cartoon exhibited). Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I hope members of the House may be seated.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Members will resume their seats.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I rise to a point of order. There is a license tax required in this District for public exhibitions of pictures, etc.; and I deny that the gentleman from Michigan has any right to evade that ordinance by coming in here with his show.

Mr. CORLISS. Judging from what I have observed in this House during three or four terms, my friend from Ohio has had as many "shows" here as any other member. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROSIUS], much to my surprise, objects to this little, harmless cartoon.

Mr. BROSIUS. Not at all.

Mr. CORLISS. Does the gentleman think it reflects on his State? [Laughter.]

Mr. BROSIUS. Not at all. I simply objected to a disorderly assemblage of members.

Mr. CORLISS. I have a few more of these cartoons, which are not so large. I will have copies of them distributed, and I would like members to sit in their seats and examine them. I think it will be instructive.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I should like to ask who is the artist to whom we are indebted for these pictures?

Mr. CORLISS. A very good man who lives in Minneapolis.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I thought the artist might be our friend from Ohio [Mr. SHATTUC]. [Laughter.]

Mr. CORLISS. One of these cartoons relates to matters in Montana. I wonder whether there is a member here from that State who will make objection.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is not necessary for me to speak further in regard to this measure. While these cartoons may be amusing, the question here involved is a serious problem. The people of the United States are looking to this House to take action upon this measure. They are tired of the evils which have arisen with reference to the election of United States Senators.

I want members here to consider the importance of this matter. How many members are there in this House who dare stand upon this floor and insist that the Constitution shall remain as it is?

The gentleman from Missouri does not propose to deprive the people of their rights in this matter. He simply wants to compel them to elect Senators by popular vote. I desire to give them a greater right, a broader privilege, one that they can exercise in their discretion.

Mr. Speaker, the reasons and arguments in favor of this amendment may be briefly summarized as follows:

First. It grants to the citizens of each State the power, if desired, to elect Senators by a direct vote of the people.

Second. It will afford a prompt and efficient remedy for the evils unfortunately resulting from the present method.

Third. It will remove from State legislatures a political influence which frequently disturbs important State affairs, arouses personal controversies, and fosters political bossism.

Fourth. It will maintain the unit of State power in the Senate as intended by the Constitution.

Fifth. It will prevent vacancies and save the time of the Senate now constantly occupied in the consideration of election cases arising from either the failure of legislatures to elect or alleged corruptions in elections.

Sixth. It will preserve inviolate the fundamental principle of our form of government—that it derives its "powers from the consent of the governed."

Seventh. A thoroughly aroused and enlightened public opinion demands the change.

Mr. Speaker, I submit that it is the duty of this House, in obedience to the expressed wish of the people in thirty different States, to pass this amendment and to continue to do so in each succeeding Congress until the exalted heads in the United States Senate shall listen to the thundering voice and bow to the will of the people.

Mr. NEVILLE. Will not the gentleman from Michigan take this side of the House into his confidence and tell us how many more planks of the Democratic platform he proposes to insert in this law?

Mr. CORLISS. My dear friend, the Democratic platform does not seem to stay with you long. Here is my friend from Missouri presenting a proposition directly opposed, as I understand, to the platforms of both the great parties of our country.

In further answer to the gentleman's question, I want to say that the proposition here is to trust the people. Are you willing to do it? Do you want to dictate to the people any more? Do you desire to force them to adopt the measure that suits you? It pleases me from my political standpoint to see members on the other side trying to force their views on the people of other States, because it is not a uniform method. I trust the people of my State. I am willing to trust the people of your State. I insist that you should not compel the people of any State to adopt a plan that they do not desire.

I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. POWERS addressed the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Michigan yield to the gentleman from Vermont?

Mr. CORLISS. The gentleman from Vermont is a member of the committee, and I am perfectly willing he shall be recognized in his own right.

Mr. NEVILLE. I should like to ask the gentleman from Michigan another question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Has the gentleman from Michigan concluded?

Mr. CORLISS. I have concluded my remarks, and I yield the floor to the gentleman from Vermont.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is the gentleman from Vermont opposed to the bill?

Mr. POWERS. I am opposed to the proposition that comes from the majority of the committee and also to the proposition that comes from the minority of the committee. [Laughter.]

In order that the House may have a precise understanding of the posture of this question, I desire to say that a majority of the committee have presented the proposition which is urged here by the gentleman from Michigan, and which is an alternative proposition. It provides for the election of Senators of the United States by the State legislature, or, if the State prefers, by a direct vote of the people. The minority of the committee has submitted a proposition for the election of United States Senators by a direct vote of the people. It is to be noticed that there is no alternative method of election proposed in the minority report; but they go a step further, and propose to amend another article of the Constitution, giving to the State the right to fix the time, place, and manner of election of Senators; and there they stop. It will be recalled by members of the House that section 4 of Article I of the Constitution provides that—

> The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time, by law, make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

The manifest purpose, therefore, of the minority proposition is to eliminate any control on the part of Congress as to the manner of electing Senators of the United States.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to any change in section 4 of Article I of the Constitution in that behalf, for this reason: That a Senator or Representative is a Federal officer. He is elected without the control of the Federal Government, but the Federal Government should be endowed with full power to control and regulate its own legislative body.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. POWERS. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does not the proposition of the minority absolutely control the election of Senators through Congress or under Federal control?

Mr. POWERS. I did not quite catch the gentleman's question.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I asked the gentleman if the proposition submitted by the minority of the committee does not absolutely retain the control of the election of United States Senators in Congress or under the supervision of the Federal Government?

Mr. POWERS. I do not so understand it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Why, their proposition is that United States Senators shall be elected by the popular vote, just as we are demanding and the people of the country are demanding.

Mr. POWERS. Yes; but as to the matter of time, place, and method of electing Senators this proposition by the minority would eliminate any control on the part of Congress to control.

Now, suppose that some State should decline to be represented in the Senate—absolutely refused to elect Senators at all. That being the case, they are doing a wrong to the entire country at large. The State of Vermont is as much interested in having Ohio represented in the Senate as the State of Ohio is itself. And so any State that sees fit to decline to elect a Senator would have the right practically to nullify the legislation of this body, because if one may refuse the majority might; and if one can do this all can do it, and you open the door to the most perfect system of secession that has ever been announced to the country or ever contemplated by the thoughtful men who have investigated this question or have taken time for its consideration.

In the last Congress—the Fifty-fifth Congress—an amendment was proposed in the same form now suggested by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CORLISS], and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] proposed an amendment providing for a direct vote of the people and saying nothing whatever about any Federal control of it. And that joint resolution passed the House almost unanimously. There were only 11 votes against it, both sides of the House being almost unanimously in favor of it.

I can not, Mr. Speaker, see why gentlemen are desirous of removing the ultimate and legitimate control of Congress over the election of their Senators and Representatives. What harm can possibly come from it? What benefit can arise from adopting the opposite procedure? It is a matter of protection to the General Government itself. It is a matter of self-defense that they may require every constituency entitled to be represented in the Senate to be actually represented on the floor of that body and leave no vacancies. They can compel the State to elect Senators if the State shall for any reason decline to do so, because they can prescribe a method by which they shall be elected.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this clause in the Constitution has never been called into action but once in the history of the Government. In 1866 the representative from my own State in the Senate proposed an act of Congress by which United States Senators should be elected at a uniform time, namely, on the second Tuesday of the session of the legislature and in a particular manner. This is the act of June, 1866, and is the only instance in which that clause of the Constitution giving Congress control over the time and place and manner of electing Senators has ever been appealed to or availed of.

Mr. FOWLER. I would like to ask the gentleman from Vermont a question for information, if he will yield for that purpose.

Mr. POWERS. Certainly.

Mr. FOWLER. How could we compel a State, under our present system of government, to elect a Senator if there were a refusal on the part of the State to do so?

Mr. POWERS. Well, suppose New Jersey, if they had sole control of the election of Senators and Representatives, declined to exercise the right. Now, Congress says that the State has a right to have representatives in the Federal Government, but the people of New Jersey take no steps to secure such election—the electors refuse to elect. In that event you have the right or the power under the law, if it should be adopted, to put the election under Federal control and submit to the people of New Jersey the opportunity to have somebody to represent them in the Federal Senate, and thus take from the people or from the control of your State legislature the election altogether, if you undertake to act in defiance of the control and power of the Federal Government over the subject. There is no question about that.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am heartily in favor of this proposition to elect Senators by a direct vote; but while I wish to say here that no man in Congress has given the time and attention to this subject which the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CORLISS] has given, and while he is entitled to a great amount of credit for the vast research that he has made and the great learning that he has displayed in the study of the question, yet it seems to me absurd to have one mode of electing Senators in one State and a different mode in another, the State of Colorado, for instance, electing by a direct vote of the people, the State of Kansas electing by a legislature, the State of Pennsylvania electing by a board of electors, if you please. They may adopt any plan they see fit under this proposition.

Mr. CORLISS. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. POWERS. Yes.

Mr. CORLISS. Is not that true with reference to the judiciary?

Mr. POWERS. I will come to that in just a moment. We should have a perfect uniformity in our system. We are amending the organic law of our country, and we should make it operative alike in all parts of the country, not in one way in one part of the country and in a different way in another.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. This is a practical and important question, and I should like to ask the gentleman from Vermont what objection there is in ingrafting on the Constitution the principle that every State shall elect its United States Senators by popular vote?

Mr. POWERS. That is just exactly what I want to have done.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, while they are doing that, if you think it advisable, you can fix the time of election of United States Senators in conjunction with this.

Mr. POWERS. Yes; and the place.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. POWERS. And the method.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Are you for the minority report, then?

Mr. POWERS. No, sir; I go a step further. The minority members have eliminated from section 4 of our present Constitution the right of Congress to make or alter the regulations that the State may adopt. I want to retain that power of self-defense in behalf of the General Government. I can see that some years ago, before the millennium came about, there might have been in some sections of the country an adherence to the old notion of State rights that would move them to insist that the Federal Government should have no control over the election even of its own representative agents or the men who are to carry it on.

In our system of dual government we do not undertake to interfere with the States as to the methods by which they shall choose their officers, and I say that the States should not interfere with the method that the Federal Government may adopt for the election of its officers, provided the Federal Government sees fit to change any special regulation that has been prescribed by the State.

But I was saying, Mr. Chairman, that in making the Constitution—and that is precisely the work that we now have in hand—it seems to me that we are making it for the whole people of the country, and that every clause in every method of election that we prescribe should be the same for Virginia and Minnesota and Vermont and every other State in this Union. The mischief that we are trying to correct by providing for election by a direct vote is to get rid of the scandals that have followed the method of electing by State legislatures.

Now, the proposition of my friend from Michigan is to allow that opportunity for scandal to remain in any State where they see fit to remain or leave to the State legislatures the power to elect, and only give the people the right to elect in States where they vote so to do. If we are going to amend the Constitution, it seems to me we should amend it for the whole people. It was made for the whole people. Every clause of it was made for the whole people, and now do not let us begin to make a patchwork Constitution by providing that you may elect Senators in one way in one State and in another way in another State.

Mr. CORLISS. Let me ask the gentleman a question. Is it not true that under the Constitution the unit of power in the Senate is different from the unit of power anywhere else in our country?

Mr. POWERS. Yes.

Mr. CORLISS. Every State has two Senators, whether it has a large or a small population, whether it has great wealth or little. Those two Senators from each State are the representatives of the people of that State. Are you not now trying to misrepresent them, or to compel them to act in a particular way, and thereby deprive some of them of the privilege that they ought to enjoy?

Mr. POWERS. My friend from Michigan fails to note the distinction between the scope of the Federal Government and the scope of the State government. The Federal Government is the unit that spreads over the whole country. He and I are sworn to our allegiance to the Federal Government; he and I are also sworn to our allegiance to our respective State governments; and so far as our State governments are concerned, the people of the State are absolute; they have plenary power; they may do what they please as to the method of electing State officials; but when you go outside of that and take on Federal functions, then it is that the Federal Government provides for a uniform system of electing its legislative body. That is what I insist upon.

Mr. CORLISS. Do we do that with reference to members of Congress? Do we not leave to the States the manner, the method, and the time of electing members of Congress?

Mr. POWERS. We now leave both the election of Senators and Representatives to the State, but have retained the right to control both. They may control your election to this House.

Mr. CORLISS. The power that the gentleman speaks of is still retained.

Mr. POWERS. It is in your amendment, but it is not in the minority report. I am contending that both are wrong, in part, at least.

Now, then, to answer the question proposed to me a moment ago by the gentleman from Michigan. He inquired if the judges of Vermont were not elected by the legislature. I say they are, and it has a perfect right to settle that question as it sees fit. United States judges are not so elected. The State judges constitute the courts that are provided for by the State legislature. So that the illustration that my friend made is not apropos to this question at all. They are acting within the scope of their proper limits of State jurisdiction. But now we are talking about representatives of the Federal Government, and providing the method of election that shall apply simply to that portion of the legislative body that is to represent the Federal Government.

Mr. CORLISS. Right on that point, is it not true that in electing the members of this House some States elect in the month of June, some in the month of September, and different methods in different States? Does it work any hardship here?

Mr. POWERS. Not at all.

Mr. CORLISS. Is not that authorized by the Constitution?

Mr. POWERS. It works no hardship here, and it is authorized by the Constitution.

Mr. CORLISS. Why not give the States the same rights in reference to the Senate that we give the people with reference to members of this House?

Mr. POWERS. There is no harm from that fact at all; but there is ever present with the Federal Constitution the right to correct.

Mr. CORLISS. And that I reserve in our amendment.

Mr. POWERS. But we do not provide that members of Congress shall be elected by the legislature in one State and by the people in another. We adhere to the popular idea that the representative of the people must be elected by the people; and the fact that they elect on one day in one State and another day in another does not touch the gist of this question. Now, then, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. KLUTTZ. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him there? I want to make this suggestion as to this section as to "the time, place, and manner of holding elections for Senators shall be prescribed in each State by the legislatures thereof." Would it not meet the gentleman's view to have it subject, however, to such laws and regulations as may be prescribed by Congress?

Mr. POWERS. Well?

Mr. KLUTTZ. That would leave it to the State where Congress did not act.

Mr. POWERS. That would exactly meet my point.

Mr. KLUTTZ. Why not strike that out?

Mr. POWERS. Strike it out and that is all right. Strike out the proposition of the minority and you will leave Article IV in force undisturbed.

Mr. KLUTTZ. I will state to the gentleman that the gentleman from Missouri who has charge of this matter agrees that that may be stricken out by unanimous consent, because we want to get at something practical and something that we can all agree to.

Mr. POWERS. Now we are brought to a practical question. The minority proposition having been amended, we are brought to the practical question whether we will adopt the amendment submitting to the legislatures of the States the question of a direct vote of the people, or submit to the legislatures of the several States the proposition to elect by a direct vote of the people, if they have a mind to, or otherwise by the legislature. That is the precise question we now have. I am in favor of submitting this to a direct vote of the people, a popular vote, for very many reasons. In the first place, it is a suggestion that has met the approval of a large majority of the American people already. Thirty or thirty-one State legislatures have already passed joint resolutions advising or proposing a change of the Constitution by which United States Senators should be elected by a direct vote of the people. I have yet to learn that any legislature has passed a resolution providing for an election by a direct vote or by the legislature, as the gentleman from Michigan proposes.

Every one of them, without exception, so far as I have seen, make no provision whatever for a continuance of the method of electing by State legislatures, but they go the whole figure and say, Submit this election to a direct vote of the people. Why should it not be so? Why, in the Federal Convention, when this matter was the subject of debate, there was a large fraction of the members in favor of submitting the election of Senators to a direct vote, but it was deemed best, after discussion, under the then existing circumstances, to provide that that election should be made by the legislatures.

One eminent member of that convention declared on the floor that he wanted to remove the election of these officers as far away from the people as possible. They must have as little to do with the election of United States Senators as possible—and that was no less a person than Mr. Sherman, of Connecticut, one of the ablest members of that convention.

Another distinguished member, Mr. Dickinson, of Delaware, said he wanted to make the United States Senate a House of Lords, or as near to it as possible, and in order to do it the electorate to choose Senators must be a different body from the populace. Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not know but they have pretty nearly succeeded in getting a House of Lords. I have sometimes thought the hope of that gentleman had been realized in some measure. [Laughter.]

But the time has at last come when it has been demonstrated by experience that a popular choice of the United States Senators would not only be safer for the rights of the people, but it would be in a thousand other ways better. A legislative body in the State is not a body chosen, is not a body provided, for any such purpose; it is chosen to make laws for the State.

In how many instances can gentlemen recall where a legislature has spent nearly its entire session in the fruitless ballot for United States Senator to the neglect of proper legislative duties resting upon it and giving their whole time to partisan scramble for United States Senators.

Not only that, but they have failed to elect in some instances, and there are several vacancies in the United States Senate because the method of election by the legislature has been found to be ineffective and not accomplishing a choice. But you submit an election to the people, and there would always be a choice; there could be no such thing as a failure to elect the Senators. So, the plan which indifferent men to-day say works well enough does not work at all, and therefore it does not work well enough.

Now, again, the election of United States Senators in certain sections of the country has been said at least—every gentleman can form his opinion as to the truth of the matter—to have been accomplished by means of corrupt methods. It has been charged—and I suppose I am exposing no secrets—it has been charged, and some gentlemen believe, that seats in the United States Senate in the past—I say nothing about the present personnel of the Senate—have been procured by the corrupt use of money. It is easier to buy up a small legislative body than it is the great mass of the people. You can not buy the whole people. It might be said in answer to this that if you provide for a popular election, there will be a convention to nominate a candidate, and, that convention being a relatively small body, that somebody may buy up 51 per cent of the members. Suppose he does; there is another gantlet that must be run. He must go before the people, and the very fact that he had procured the nomination by fraudulent means would give to the people a lever to pry over that would forever blast his hopes of success at the polls.

It is one of the greatest possible securities to give this election to the people, even though men may practice fraudulent methods in securing a nomination to the office. But when you submit the matter to the legislature and buy that up, there is no further appeal; they are bought for all time. The mischief has been perpetrated, and there is no remedy left. I have said this proposition has been one that merits and receives popular approval. The very fact that thirty States have asked for the proposition is pretty good evidence of the popular opinion of the majority of the States in this Union. Not only that, this House has itself, during the last Congress, as I have already stated, passed that proposition in the form I now urge—the clean, straight, naked proposition to submit it to the people, upon an amendment proposed by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], and I presume that he will propose the same amendment again; I hope he will. That passed the House with only 11 votes against it.

Some of the political parties have incorporated this proposition into their platforms, but they never have asked for an alternative proposition. It has been a straight, clean proposition to submit the matter to the vote of the people. My friend from Michigan says, Can not you trust the people? I reiterate his inquiry, Can not you trust the people? Can not you trust the people better than you can trust part of the people to elect one way and a part of the legislatures to elect the other?

Mr. CORLISS. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Do you think the Senators from the fifteen States that have not passed resolutions on this question would vote for your proposition?

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker, what my opinion might be about that is of very little importance. I do not think we should test the merits of a proposition by inquiring whether Senators from fifteen States are going to vote for or against the measure. It makes no difference how a Senator may vote; that is his business, not mine. It is our business here to adopt the proposition which commends itself to our judgment; and when it gets over to the Senate, it is for that body to determine whether it meets with the judgment of Senators or not.

Mr. CORLISS. Have we not presented the proposition you advocate on at least three different occasions, and has not the Senate simply allowed it to die?

Mr. POWERS. Yes; that is true, and I propose for one to bombard the United States Senate with a good proposition until they come to their senses and adopt it. [Applause.]

I confess, Mr. Speaker, that this great reform—and it is a reform—is one that has been clogged in its pathway at the other end of the Capitol. I confess that I expect the time will never come when our Constitution may be changed until the proposition to amend it is tried along the lines of the other method provided in the Constitution. It will be remembered that the Constitution provides two methods of amendment. One is for Congress to take the initiative, as we are doing now, and present to the State legislatures a proposition for amendment. The other is for the States to take the initiative; and in that event, if two-thirds of the States join in the proposition to Congress, it is the duty of that body to call a national convention to pass upon the question of proposed amendments.

Mr. Speaker, there are two classes of men that have opposed this proposition in the past. One class is represented by the ultra conservative man and the other by the ultra indifferent man. The conservative man hesitates to vote for a change of our Federal Constitution, because, he says, "It was the work of inspired men. It is a great magna charta of liberty prepared by the wisest men of their day or any day, and therefore we must adhere to it." The man who speaks thus forgets that ten years after our Constitution was adopted twelve different amendments were made to it. So that this great work of the "inspired" men was found early after they had launched it to need some changes. Thus the idea that this Constitution is the inspired work of great men has been somewhat shattered by the historical facts to which I have alluded.

And we know that about seventy years later three or four more amendments were adopted. As the country has grown and the application of our system of government to existing conditions has required changes they have been made. The existing method of electing Senators has been demonstrated to be wrong—during the last twenty-five years more conspicuously than ever before. It is only since wealth has become so enormous—since our great manufacturing and railroad enterprises have become enlarged—that people have discovered that the power of wealth and corporate influence has invaded the legislatures of the States and turned them over to the election of Senators by corrupt methods. Hence arises this demand for a constitutional amendment.

There is nothing in the assumption that the instrument is a sacred one. The men who framed it knew that it was not to exist for all time without change, because they expressly provided not one but two methods by which it could be changed; and they provided a method by which, if Congress should become corrupt or unmindful of the rights of the people, the people themselves might initiate a scheme for constitutional changes. So that the argument of the conservative man, it seems to me, should have very little weight on this subject.

The argument of the indifferent man is, "Oh, it works well enough." There are a great many men in this world who are disinclined to take part in any new movement, to adopt any new suggestion, because, they say, "Old methods are working well; let them alone." Now, Mr. Speaker, the very fact that the present system of electing Senators does not in some instances work at all is a pretty good answer to the claim that it is working well enough. Here are States unrepresented; States that have been unrepresented for the last six or eight years; and they will continue in this condition just as long as the money influence can get control of a legislative body. The only remedy we have left to us is to change the methods of election and give to the people the control of this subject. In that way the idea of a government of the people and by the people can be realized. [Applause.]

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I now yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ZIEGLER].

Mr. ZIEGLER. Mr. Speaker, the question under discussion by the committee rises above the usual discussions in this House and involves an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

It is comforting as well as refreshing to hear at times debate upon a subject that does not appeal to political passion and prejudice. Nothing that I may say, therefore, in the course of my remarks, can be construed as of a political character. I shall endeavor to address the mind and conscience of each member, believing that the vote will be divided as perhaps the discussion of no other question can divide it.

The distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER], who has the honor to have expressed in writing the views of the minority, and who some time ago sustained the report in an able argument, and I, who now speak, are the only two members of the committee who signed the minority report, and we are hopeful that after this measure is discussed there will be found more than two-thirds who, by their votes, will sustain our views. For the attainment of this hope I will immediately address myself to a consideration of the proposed amendments and will advocate the views contained in the minority report.

The third section of Article I of the Constitution of the United States provides that—

> The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the legislature thereof, for six years.

It is this provision of the Constitution that we seek to amend.

There is no difference of opinion among the members of the committee having in charge the consideration of this important measure as to the absolute necessity for a constitutional amendment as to the method of electing Senators of the United States.

There is, however, this difference of opinion on the subject: The minority report favors the election of United States Senators by a direct vote of the people in all the States of the Union. It seeks to take from the legislatures of all the States the right to elect Senators and confers that power upon the people of each and every State of the Union. The majority report, it is true, as stated therein, broadens and extends the sovereign right of the people of the State by placing in their power the right to either continue the present method for the election of United States Senators by the legislature or by a direct vote of the people when in their judgment such method would correct the existing evils and insure to the State her full representation in the United States Senate.

We would deprive all legislatures from exercising any such right and confer the right directly upon the people of all the States. We would give this right by constitutional amendment to the people of all the States, because we have in them a greater confidence that wiser and better selections would be made by them through State conventions than by the legislatures. It may be said in answer to this that the people can make mistakes. This is true, but the people can be trusted to quickly remedy any mistakes they make.

Under the system provided in the minority report candidates for the United States Senate would be nominated by State conventions, and they are larger bodies than the legislature and could not so easily be approached, corrupted, and purchased. If, however, an unworthy candidate for the United States Senate be nominated by State conventions and if the method of his nomination be irregular or obtained by unfair or corrupt means, the people can be trusted at the ensuing election to defeat any candidate so nominated.

Governors of Commonwealths, State officers, and the judiciary are all elected by the people, and we believe they should in like manner be permitted to elect United States Senators, not by a diversity of ways, but uniformly. Why should the great Commonwealth of Pennsylvania have one method of electing United States Senators and Texas another? Why should Ohio elect by the legislature and Massachusetts by the people? We should have uniformity in the system and not incongruity.

For the purpose of enforcing upon the minds of the committee the simplicity of the proposed amendment as contained in the minority report, to show the clearness with which it is stated and the entire absence of incongruity, I may be permitted to again state it here, although but recently reported by the Clerk of the House:

> Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That in lieu of the first paragraph of section 3 of Article I of the Constitution of the United States, and in lieu of so much of paragraph 2 of the same section as relates to the filling of vacancies, the following be proposed as an amendment to the Constitution, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as a part of the Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States:
> "The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, who shall be elected by a direct vote of the people thereof for a term of six years, and each Senator shall have one vote. A plurality of the votes cast for candidates for Senator shall be sufficient to elect. The electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislatures, respectively.
> "When a vacancy happens by resignation or otherwise, in the representation of any State in the Senate, the same shall be filled for the unexpired term thereof in the same manner as is provided for the election of Senators in paragraph 1: Provided, That the executive thereof may make temporary appointment until the next general or special election, in accordance with the statutes or constitution of such State."
> This amendment shall not be so construed as to affect the election or term of any Senator chosen before it becomes valid as a part of the Constitution.

The majority report well says that the Constitution in its present form spreads in the pathway of the members of the legislature a moral temptation through which many good and true men of merit are forced to defeat and the glory and honor of a Senatorship snatched from the hands of the people by corrupt means. This statement is preceded, Mr. Speaker, by a quotation from the Lord's Prayer, "Lead us not into temptation." And yet the majority report would leave that temptation to exist in some of the States, for surely wherever the people would refuse to depart from the present method of electing Senators there the temptation would exist and the evils complained of would be carried on.

Let me illustrate: The legislature would overcome the tempter in the wilderness; it would overcome the tempter on a pinnacle of the temple; but should the legislature be taken up into an exceeding high mountain and shown all the kingdoms of the world and the glory of them, and told by the tempter, all these things will I give thee if you make me United States Senator, in that case the legislature yields to the tempter. We would destroy the last vestige of right in the legislatures to elect, and give this right to the people who are the sovereigns and who as a body are not so easily corrupted.

I very well understand it has been argued that both methods give the right to the people to say how Senators shall be elected, but who does not believe that there are some States where the people would not change the existing method of electing Senators—and I have seen the statement in the special Washington letter written by the distinguished member of this House, writing upon this subject (I refer to Mr. CLARK, of Missouri), that the States in which this law would be the most salutary are likely to be the States where the legislatures would make the selection. We would get rid, if possible, of the humiliating spectacle presented in recent efforts to elect United States Senators in some of the States, where corruption and bribery are charged, arrests made, and men tried and now awaiting trial in the courts, and upon failure to elect by the legislatures, unconstitutional powers exercised by governors of States in making appointments of United States Senators in manner clearly illegal and unauthorized by State constitutions.

Mr. Speaker, the United States Senate is a place of great trust and honor, and they upon whom this great trust and honor is placed should be elected by a direct vote of the people. It is the safer way of the two measures proposed. I am in favor of submitting the straight and single proposition to the Senate. The majority report contains an option. If the minority report is voted down and the majority report adopted, you perpetuate the very evils of which those who favor the majority report, as well as all of us, complain. Some States may change the system, and others will not. In those States where the legislatures are under the control of machine politicians or bosses no change will occur. There are some States in the Union where the machine is so strongly intrenched and where the power of the bosses is so great that no change would be made, because the machine influence and bosses would so direct.

Let us hope that if the minority report is passed here and in the Senate, there will be found in the Union three-fourths of the States which will ratify the amendment and such States as those about which I have been speaking will be compelled to accept the amendment as the law of the land. Let us, by submitting this question to a direct vote of the people, save the disgrace and humiliating spectacle presented by a rich man buying his way into the United States Senate by way of the legislature. Such scenes will then be a thing of the past, and poor but able and competent men will have some show of a nomination by a State convention and an election by the people.

The majority report says the impression prevails that it is as difficult for a poor man to enter the Senate of the United States as for a rich man to enter the kingdom of heaven. Such an impression does prevail, I am sorry to admit, but we desire to remove that impression by making it almost, if not entirely, impossible for a rich man to buy a State convention and a majority of the people at the general election. We desire to make it as impossible for a rich man to buy both State convention and the people as it would be for him to go through the eye of a needle.

Mr. Speaker, the great State of Pennsylvania voted against the election of Senators by the legislatures in 1787 when this subject was before the Convention which framed the Constitution. Her citizens to-day favor the same doctrine. They clamor for a change pure and simple. They ask a direct vote of the people for Senators. The public press demands it. The resolution adopted by the last session of the legislature evidences the prevailing sentiment of the people.

The majority report quotes it as an argument in its favor. It is no argument in favor of the majority report. It sustains the contention of the minority report. Permit me to read it:

> Whereas it is evident, judging by the tone of the public press, as well as by the resolutions of the State legislatures and the resolutions passed year after year by the National House of Representatives, that a majority of the American people desire a change in the Constitution whereby they may elect the President, Vice-President, and United States Senators by direct popular vote. Therefore, be it

Resolved (if the senate concur), That a committee of five, two from the senate and three from the house, be appointed to confer with the legislatures of other States of the Union with the view of bringing about the submission of an amendment to secure the desired result; this committee to report to the legislature in 1901, and not to incur expenses to exceed $500 for the two years.

What is the result desired by the adoption of the said resolution?

Not that the present method of electing Senators of the United States by the legislatures may be preserved in some States and denied in others, but an amendment to the Constitution of the United States which shall provide for the election of United States Senators by a direct popular vote. This is the demand of the people, of the public press, and of our State legislators.

It is contemplated within the year to hold a convention in Philadelphia for the purpose of giving expression upon this question. This convention, it is expected, will be composed of representatives from all the States of the Union, and is the direct outcome of recent events in the election of Senators in Ohio, Delaware, and Montana, and the efforts to elect in Pennsylvania and California.

There is no issue in which the people are interested in which their dissatisfaction is more clearly defined. Some years ago, if I am not mistaken, the question, Shall United States Senators be chosen by a popular vote, was submitted for expression of opinion to the people of California, and 187,958 votes were cast for popular election of Senators and 13,342 votes against the proposition. I believe every county in the State gave a majority in favor of popular election of United States Senators. After the experience that California has recently had there would in my opinion be scarcely any votes recorded in favor of maintaining the present method. If this Congress does not meet the popular demand, there is another method provided by the Federal Constitution which will require Congress to act.

That provision is, on the application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, Congress shall call a convention for proposing amendments. This provision is found in Article V of the Constitution, the same article which requires two-thirds of both Houses to agree to the contemplated constitutional amendment. The voice of a great convention, such as I have said will be held, ought to have some effect upon the Senators of the United States, who have several times heretofore refused to permit that body to be reformed.

It is sad to reflect that the Senate that needs reforming is the very body that, for personal reasons, stands in the way of reform. It may be, if two-thirds of the members of this House sustain the minority report and send it to the Senate, it may not pass the Committee on Elections and Privileges; or, if it is reported favorably, that it will be voted down; but mark my prediction: Many of us will live long enough to see this House and the Senate driven so strongly by popular demand that the people's mandate will have to be obeyed by one or the other method of amending our Federal Constitution to permit United States Senators to be chosen by a direct vote of the people in all the States of the Union.

When the legislature of the State of Ohio in 1896 adopted a similar resolution to that adopted in Pennsylvania, it did not contemplate a retention anywhere of the present system of electing United States Senators or even make it permissible in any State. This resolution is quoted in the majority report as though it sustained the proposition therein contained. I read it:

Resolved by the general assembly of the State of Ohio, That the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America be memorialized as follows: The general assembly of the State of Ohio respectfully requests the Congress of the United States to submit a constitutional amendment providing for the election of United States Senators by a direct vote of the qualified electors of each State of the Union. The general assembly believes that such an amendment to the national Constitution will result in each State having at all times a full representation in the national Senate, will prevent protracted and disturbing contests for membership therein, and will prevent all attempts to influence improperly or corruptly the selection of members to the national Senate. The general assembly believes, as all political power in the United States comes from the people, that the sole right to select all legislative officers should by the Constitution be vested directly in the people.

Resolved, That the governor is hereby respectfully requested to forward a duly authenticated copy of this memorial (with the vote upon its passage), under the great seal of this State, to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from this State, in order that the same may be brought to the attention of the Congress of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, we will all observe that the resolution calls upon us as the representatives of the people to submit a constitutional amendment providing for a direct vote of the people of each State of the Union. So it will be observed the demand of the people and the demand of the legislatures is for a uniform system and not for an incongruous one. Similarly there comes up from Montana a joint memorial and brought about by the investigation of charges that a Senator of the United States bought his way into that distinguished body. It is addressed to the Senate and House of Representatives, and reads as follows:

Your memorialists, the legislative assembly of the State of Montana, respectfully represent that we believe there is a general desire upon the part of the legal voters of the State of Montana that United States Senators should be elected by a direct vote of the people, and that the election of United States Senators by the legislative assembly, under the present provisions of the Constitution and laws of the United States, retards and delays the business of the sessions seriously.

Therefore your memorialists respectfully request you to take such steps as may be necessary to secure such amendments to the Constitution and laws of the United States as will provide for the election of United States Senators by a direct vote of the people, and we urge our Senators and Representatives in Congress to use their best endeavors to secure such amendments.

This resolution is quoted by the majority report as sustaining its contention. It does not do so. It sustains the minority report. We are told that 24 other States have passed similar resolutions, and I venture the assertion that every one of them contemplates uniformity of the election of Senators, as contemplated by the minority report.

Mr. Speaker, a measure similar to that of the minority report has on different occasions passed the national House of Representatives and has found its burial ground in the Senate. It has passed the Fifty-second Congress. In the Fifty-third Congress, House resolution No. 20, on the same subject, passed by a vote of 141 yeas to 50 nays. In the Fifty-fifth Congress it passed by the following vote: Yeas, 185; nays, 11. I would have this House now reenact this measure. I would give it anew the form of law, as expressive at least of the mind of this House on this important question, and send it to the Senate, there to give the Senators once more an opportunity to meet the demands of the people and make it the law of the land or again bury it.

Opinions of Senators on this proposed constitutional amendment have been obtained and were published in a recent edition of the New York Journal, which paper strongly advocates the election of Senators by a direct vote of the people. It may not be considered inappropriate to call the attention of the House to these utterances. On the contrary, they will show that there is but one argument advanced against the contemplated change of the Constitution, and that of the weakest character. Senator CHANDLER is quoted as saying:

It does not appear that by electing Senators by direct votes of the people we shall get any nearer to the popular wishes than we do now. If Senators are elected by the people, State conventions of the political parties will name the Senators. Is it any more difficult improperly to control the bare majority in the State convention than the legislature? Is a political party State caucus any more likely to act independently, honorably, or wisely than the legislature?

Senator PETTUS, of Alabama, thinks that "there will be abuses in any system," and that "the people have their own remedy in the election of proper legislators."

Senator HOAR, of Massachusetts, holds that "such a method of election, involving the manipulation of party conventions, will create new temptations to fraud and corruption."

Senator PRITCHARD, of North Carolina, remarks:

"I am inclined to believe that the nomination of Senators by the party conventions would result in just as much scandal as complained of now. It would be just as easy for rich men to buy up conventions as it is for them to buy up legislatures."

These are the opinions of a few of the Senators, and it is well known that there are a number of Senators who favor the minority report. Let us hope that not many of the grave and reverend Senators entertain such views as those above expressed. It is perfectly plain, by way of answer to these Senators, that it would be more difficult to control a State convention than a legislature, and, moreover, if a State convention would be improperly or fraudulently controlled, it could not guarantee the election, because, as the New York Journal says, it could not deliver the goods. It has been argued here, and in the light of the utterances of Senators which I have quoted, it may be said that the Senate of the United States will not pass the amendment. That may be so, but so far as I am concerned, I do not believe that this House should legislate to please the Senate. We should legislate here as we think right and proper.

I do not believe in bowing to expediency nor in sending to the Senate an optional measure, a halfway amendment, because there is a better prospect of passing it or because it is better than nothing. The question is, What is right, what ought we to do? Do not be swerved from the path of duty by the argument that if the minority report passes here it will not be adopted by the Senate. Follow in the line where duty directs. If on three prior occasions this House believed the principle contemplated in the minority report and regarded it as right, say so the fourth time.

Keep on sending it to the Senate for such action as in its wisdom may be deemed right and proper. If the measure be again defeated in the Senate, the responsibility will be with the Senate of the United States and not with the Representatives of the people in this House. Mr. Speaker, with profound regard for the views and conclusions expressed in the report of the majority, still I am forced to dissent from that report so far as relates to the mode or manner of electing United States Senators alone, and as a reason for my position I am content to rely upon my judgment, fortified and sustained by the expressed wishes and demands of the people of more than thirty States of the Union, for which I confess I have a more profound regard.

The people have appealed to Congress to permit them to elect

United States Senators by a direct vote. This appeal is not sectional, nor is it partisan. It reaches us from all sections and from the different political parties with a degree of unanimity quite surprising and unaccountable, if not guided and impelled by a sense of righteous indignation aroused by reports and accusations of alleged methods sometimes employed by gentlemen whose ambitions lead them to seek a seat in the Senate of the United States. We can well afford—indeed, as their representatives it is our bounden duty—to respect the wishes and do the will of the people and give them a uniform law allowing them by direct vote to elect their Senators.

Believing, as I do, that the time has come when the Constitution should be amended, to the end that the high and exalted position of a Senatorship shall not be suspicioned of being purchasable, and that the dignity, integrity, and honor of this great office may never be assailed, and with unwavering confidence in the intelligence, wisdom, and patriotism of the people, I respectfully recommend the adoption of the substitute for the resolution reported by the majority. [Applause.]

During the delivery of the foregoing remarks the following proceedings took place:

Mr. CORLISS. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania permit me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. ZIEGLER. Certainly.

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania has consented to an interruption to enable me to submit to the House an understanding reached between myself and the gentleman from Missouri who represents the minority on this question. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER], in charge of the minority report, and myself agree to ask unanimous consent that the general discussion of this subject shall continue during the afternoon of to-day, with leave to any gentleman to extend his remarks in the RECORD, and that a vote shall be taken upon the question immediately after the reading of the Journal to-morrow morning, without debate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will submit the request to the House. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan that debate shall continue during the remainder of this day and a vote be taken immediately after the reading of the Journal to-morrow morning, without debate; and also that gentlemen who have addressed the House have general leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD? Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania permit an interruption before he resumes his seat?

Mr. ZIEGLER. I will.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I want to say only this, and perhaps the gentleman may not agree with me: That the first objection in the way of the desired legislation is in the Senate of the United States——

Mr. ZIEGLER. Yes, sir; undoubtedly.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi (continuing). That body being interested in a great measure to prevent such legislation, and the Senate and the legislatures of the States are interested to some extent in the same way. Now, the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Missouri does away with one of the two objections which are obstacles to the legislation proposed. Is that not true?

Mr. ZIEGLER. That is true; but the obstruction is still at the other end of the building; and it is mortifying that the body to be reformed by this process is the very body that stands in the way of the reform demanded by the people of this country. [Applause.]

Mr. RUCKER. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KLUTTZ].

Mr. KLUTTZ. Mr. Speaker, I am glad that we have enough of the Constitution left for purposes of amendment; and as we have kept the remains of that venerated instrument so resolutely at home, it behooves us to amend it as resolutely for the best interests of our own home people. I am an old-fashioned believer in the Constitution.

While it remains the supreme law of the land it should be obeyed, and those of us who have sworn to observe it should be careful in all things to conform both to its letter and spirit. Unfortunately, both have been grievously violated in the election of Senators of the United States, and the time has long since come when its provisions in that behalf have demonstrably shown the need of amendment. [Applause.]

Our fathers, honest themselves, too implicitly believed that their descendants would always remain so.

The honest people of a State, electing supposedly honest members of their State legislatures, likewise mistakenly believe, as is too often proven, that they will remain honest after election.

The most superficial perusal of the records of Congress for many years, including the present session down to this very date, demonstrates that if wise at the time of its adoption, the method of electing United States Senators by the legislatures of the several States has long since become an evil which cries aloud for amendment. [Applause.]

The people of this country, in tones not to be mistaken, demand that they be allowed to elect Senators by their own direct vote, and the legislatures of the great States of Ohio, Pennsylvania, Montana, Arkansas, California, Colorado, Florida, Idaho, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, Kansas, Kentucky, Louisiana, Michigan, Minnesota, Nebraska, Nevada, New Hampshire, North Carolina, North Dakota, Oregon, Utah, Washington, Wisconsin, Wyoming, and others, thirty-four in all, have voiced this demand in petitions and memorials to Congress and in resolutions of instruction to their representatives here.

In the light of recent scandalous events, the petitions from some of these States are absolutely pathetic. If the people could have directly elected Senators, the obloquy which in the popular estimation—and too justly so—beclouds the title to many seats in that august body could never have had foundation.

The report of the majority of the committee shows that under the present system several vacancies now exist, due to the corrupt manipulations of State legislatures by wealthy aspirants for Senatorial honors. Very recent exposures made by committees of the Senate are such as to emphasize the absolute need for speedy amendment of the Constitution in this regard.

It is enough for me that the people demand it, that all the people demand it, for "everybody is wiser than anybody," even if "anybody" happens to be the Senate of the United States. [Applause.] I quote these axiomatic truths from the committee's report:

> The fundamental principle of a republican form of government is based upon the idea that it derives its just powers from the consent of the governed.

Again:

> If the people have the wisdom to elect governors and State officers, our State judiciary (and Representative in Congress), why may they not be permitted to enjoy the right of electing United States Senators?

What divinity doth hedge about these august Senators that the common people may only vote for them indirectly and by proxy?

Let us tear down the intermediary wall and take from the legislatures the selection of United States Senators, and we will destroy one of the most potent powers (to quote again the language of the committee) through which corporate influence now holds its sway, and it can then no longer be said that it is as difficult for a poor man to enter the Senate of the United States as for a rich man to enter the Kingdom of Heaven.

There are many honorable men in the Senate, and therefore I shall make no application of the story of the old darkey preacher, who, before beginning his sermon, raised a large rock aloft with the startling announcement, "Thar is a nigger in this congregation what's been stealing chickens last night, and I'm gwine to heave this here rock at his head," when every male head before him at once ducked behind a bench. [Laughter and applause.]

I will not say that a somewhat similar announcement, varied only to suit the environment, would be followed by similar action in the Senate.

Mr. Speaker, in supporting this proposition I am not merely giving expression to my individual views, but I am speaking for the whole people of North Carolina, as I believe, without regard to party.

I am but obeying a resolution of instructions from the legislature of my State, which was passed unanimously, as I recollect, without party distinction or division, and I am but trying to give effect to one of the planks of the Democratic platform of my State.

Neither of the propositions before the House is exactly what I could wish, but I am so heartily in favor of the general proposition that I shall heartily support the substitute offered on behalf of the minority by the distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER], amended to accord with the suggestions of the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POWERS].

I am reminded of the homely wisdom of a young fellow in my district, who, on his first venture at courting, was discarded, or, as we say in North Carolina, was "kicked." Of course he was awfully surprised, for every young fellow thinks that any girl ought to be glad to get him and can not understand why he should be rejected. So, stunned and smarting, he insisted upon knowing why she would not have him. Finally she said, "Johnny, it's because I love somebody else better." "Oh, yes, Sally," said he; "so do I, but we can't get them, you know." [Laughter.]

That young man had very nearly sounded the depths of the safer philosophy of life; and it is generally wise to do the best we can under any given circumstances.

Acting upon this principle, I shall support the substitute of the minority, amended to meet the views of gentlemen, amended in any and every minor detail, so only that it maintains and holds out to the American people a genuine, general, and feasible plan of electing Senators by a direct vote without intermediary. I have hope, sir, that the quickened conscience of the Senate will join us in submitting such an amendment to the Constitution, and if submitted to the legislatures of the several States its adoption is as certain as the rising of the morrow's sun. [Applause.]

I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BREAZEALE].

Mr. BREAZEALE. Mr. Speaker, I yield to no man in reverence to the Constitution of this great Republic. I regard it with pride and admiration, and venerate its wisdom, its majesty, and its beauty. The fathers builded better than they knew. This remarkable instrument, framed for the government of 3,000,000 people, has proven amply sufficient for the government of 100,000,000 human beings, and will stand with its undying principles for the government of millions yet to be born.

I readily concede, Mr. Speaker, that in the matter of amending this instrument we should be conservative and cautious. The fullest consideration should be given the question, and before reaching a final conclusion we should be thoroughly satisfied in our minds and conscience that the amendment proposed is wise, just, necessary for the public welfare, and dictated by the loftiest and most patriotic motives.

The bill under consideration proposes an amendment to section 3 of Article I of the Constitution relative to the method of electing United States Senators. The langnage of the bill is as follows:

SEC. 3. The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen for six years, and each Senator shall have one vote. These Senators shall be chosen by the legislatures of the several States unless the people of any State, either through their legislature or by the constitution of the State, shall provide for the election of United States Senators by direct vote of the people; then, in such case, United States Senators shall be elected in such State at large by direct vote of the people; a plurality shall elect, and the electors shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature.

When vacancies happen, by resignation or otherwise, in the representation of any State in the Senate, the same shall be filled for the unexpired term thereof in the same manner as is provided for the election of Senators in paragraph 1: Provided, That the legislature of any State may empower the executive thereof to make temporary appointments until the next general election, in accordance with the statutes or constitution of such State.

"This amendment shall not be so construed as to affect the election or term of any Senator chosen before it becomes valid as a part of the Constitution.

The report of the committee to which this bill was referred is unanimous that a change in the Constitution is necessary.

Now, sir, why is the change necessary? For more than one hundred years Senators have been elected by the legislatures of the respective States. I shall not go deeply into the reasons for a change, nor shall I go deeply into the history, constitutional and legislative, of the article of the Constitution sought to be amended.

I shall content myself with a brief review of the proceedings of the Convention that framed the organic law, and endeavor to point out the wisdom and necessity for the change proposed.

The article of the Constitution providing for the election of Senators by the legislatures of the respective States was not adopted by the unanimous vote of the Convention. Two States, exercising an influence on the work of that Convention perhaps larger than any other two of the States represented in that august body, were opposed to the method adopted. Both Pennsylvania and Virginia refused their assent to the method, and urged that to the people of the respective States be reserved the right and power to elect by direct vote their representatives in that most important branch of government—the United States Senate.

In no uncertain terms did Mr. Madison and Mr. Mason, of Virginia, and Mr. Wilson, of Pennsylvania, express their confidence in the wisdom and ability of the people to elect their Senators. They sought to lay the foundation of the governmental fabric upon a solid and broad basis. As Mr. Madison expressed it—

The great fabric to be raised would be more stable and durable if it should rest on the solid foundation of the people themselves than if it should stand merely on the pillars of the legislatures.

I do not deem it necessary at this time to discuss the reasons urged for the final action of the Convention. A careful analysis of the utterances of many of the great men composing that body, including both Jefferson and Hamilton, justifies, perhaps, the assertion that neither of those two master minds were fixed in the opinion that Mr. Madison was not right.

Now, sir, viewing the question from the standpoint of necessity, I submit there are overwhelming reasons appealing to the conscience of every patriotic man that the time has come for a change in the present method of electing Senators.

I will not pause to discuss the law of the case. I will not pause to discuss whether or not under the constitution of this State, or of that State, or under the Constitution of the United States, the governor of a State has or has not the right to appoint the United States Senator under any circumstances whatever. It would be bootless to discuss that question. Suffice it to say that under the law as it now stands sovereign States of this Union have been and are now without full representation in the Senate department of this Government. Such a condition of affairs justifies, in my judgment, radical and immediate remedy. If the Constitution is the bar, then amend that Constitution. Stand not upon the order of amending, but amend at once.

I do not deem it necessary to review history to show the many cases of grave injustice done to sovereign States in thus depriving them of representation in the Senate of the United States. I deem it unnecessary to point out the present vacancies in State representation in the Senate; we are all familiar with these and have heard ad nauseam the arguments pro and con. I submit, sir, that such a condition is a crying shame, and an infamous outrage upon the people of these States, and the law that permits such injustice should be stricken from the statute books.

The plan proposed by the committee of which I have the honor to be a member offers a remedy for the evil; adopt it, and under its operation you will never again hear of vacancies existing in the United States Senate by reason of the failure to elect.

And now, Mr. Speaker, I propose to discuss another phase of the evil of permitting legislatures to elect Senators—a phase of the question alike disagreeable and revolting. Sir, I have been taught to revere, and I do revere, the institutions of my country. I glory in her grandeur and her greatness. I venerate her Constitution and her laws, and under my oath I would uphold them with all the energy of my soul. I have been taught to believe, sir, and I do believe, that to be a representative of a sovereign State in the Senate of the Union is the highest honor which can be conferred by a State upon a citizen. To aspire to that high and exalted position is worthy the ambition of any honest man. To fill that dignified and honorable station should be the lasting pride of any virtuous citizen. High and honorable position as it is in the estimation of all people; high and honorable position as it is in reality, it should be exempt from the blighting influences of scandal and the degrading shadow of corruption.

Mr. Speaker, I point to the investigation recently going on at the other end of the Capitol building as the strongest argument that can be presented in support of this measure. A Senator of the United States, the representative of a sovereign State, is compelled to defend himself against the charge of corrupting the members of a State legislature and buying his seat in the United States Senate. The dignity of the position is lowered, the honor of a State is tarnished, the self-respect of the whole people of the whole Union is impaired by the spectacle. The sickening, nauseating details of the case, the hideous evidence dragged from unctuous witnesses is revolting to every honest man and is a stench in the nostrils of the nation. Sir, I am not concerned with the truth or falsity of the charges made. It makes no difference in the consideration of this measure whether the verdict be guilty or not guilty; the fact remains that under our present system charges of infamy and corruption can be made and can be supported by evidence which brings the blush of shame to the cheek of every American citizen. And if the majority report of the committee is adopted, I have sufficient confidence in the integrity and virtue of the citizens of every State in the Union that they will demand and enforce their right to place the election of United States Senators beyond the corrupting influence of money.

Legislators may be bought. They may be bought in sufficient number to elect the Senator; but, sir, I deny that the people can be bought. I have an abiding confidence in the people. When all else fails, an appeal to the honor, the integrity, the virtue of the plain people is never made in vain. There is another sound reason for this change, Mr. Speaker; it exists in the pernicious, injurious effect the election of Senators now has upon legislation in the various States. It dominates in importance, either in reality or in the force of circumstances, every measure coming before the legislature, and its pernicious influence is frequently felt in preventing the adoption of wholesome legislation. Even the legislatures of many of the States have seen the necessity for the change recommended. Some thirty of the States, through their legislatures, have memorialized Congress to amend the organic law in this particular.

Again, Mr. Speaker, it too frequently happens that the Senator elected considers that he owes no allegiance to the people of the State that he represents; considering that he was elected by the legislature and not by the people, he ignores their expressed wishes and arrogates to himself the wisdom of all the ages, considers himself the master, not the servant of the people, and casts his vote in direct opposition to the expressed will of the people whom he represents.

I take it for granted that the committee, as a whole, reflects the views and the wishes of the House, and that consequently this House is unanimous in desiring a change in the organic law. The committee differ only as to the scope of that change, and two reports are presented.

The majority of that committee propose that the several States be empowered to select one of two methods of electing Senators. The minority propose restricting that power to one method of election.

So far as I am concerned I strongly favor the majority report. I have carefully considered all the arguments advanced by the minority and I fail to discover a single one sound in principle or wise in the light of experience. But, sir, I shall cheerfully vote for the substitute or any measure that will give the people the right to elect their Senators, but my better judgment tells me the majority report stands a better chance of adoption by the Senate than the minority substitute.

They urge in its favor there should be uniformity throughout the Republic in the manner of electing the members of this important branch of the Government. That it would not look nice to have one State elect by direct vote of the people and the adjoining State to elect by the legislature. This idea of uniformity appeals with more force perhaps to the lawyer than to the layman. As a trained lawyer I would like to see in all things the beautiful symmetry of the Constitution preserved. Had I the sole power to effect this change I would unhesitatingly adopt the views of the minority and compel every State to elect its representatives in the national Senate by direct vote of the people, but in doing so I would yield to my training as a lawyer and to the objection every lawyer has to an incongruity, real or fancied, in the laws of the land, organic or legislative.

But this idea applied to this particular case is purely sentimental and will not bear the test of sound reasoning and critical analysis. It must yield to the principle involved in the majority report. This being a government by the people, whatever laws tending to increase and enlarge the right of self-government finds its support in that principle. The optional method of electing Senators proposed by the majority of the committee most assuredly increases and enlarges the power of the people. It is, in my judgment, the soundest Democratic doctrine. It does not restrict as the minority report does, but empowers the people to select either method—elect the Senator by their direct votes or to delegate that authority to their representatives in the State legislature. It recognizes the principle of local self-government and the principle of home rule.

Viewing the question from a practical standpoint, I believe the majority report will meet with the least resistance in its consideration by the Senate of the United States. It requires two-thirds of both Houses to adopt this measure; and if it passes this Chamber and goes to the Senate, it will require the vote of two-thirds of the membership of that body to enact it into law. Each member of that body is directly interested in its provisions. It is fair to presume that self-interest, always a powerful factor, will have more or less influence on each vote. We are all human and very human when it comes to matters of this kind. The experience of the past should largely influence our vote. Three times within the past few years has this measure, in its general scope as proposed by the minority, passed this House and been waylaid and murdered in the Senate.

Many Senators who opposed the measure urged as reasons, therefore, the fact that the people of their respective States desired no change; that their people were perfectly content with the present method of election and opposed a change. Conceding to those Senators what we demand for ourselves—honesty of purpose and a desire to faithfully represent our constituents—we can not successfully answer them. But now we come with a different proposition. We say to them, "Very well; we admit the people of Maine and Vermont and New Hampshire desire no change in the method of electing Senators, but the people of Michigan and Wisconsin and Louisiana do desire a change; now we submit to you a plan by which all can be satisfied." What answer can they make? Some one has said, "Let us keep knocking at the door of the Senate Chamber, in the name of the people, until they do hear." I agree most heartily, Mr. Speaker; and I submit, sir, that the majority report herein is a double knock, so loud its thunderous tones are sufficient to awake even the dead.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I believe the majority report is sound in principle, in harmony with the fundamental principles of self-government; wise, expedient, and essentially practical. The argument that it would be a constant bone of contention, a firebrand in the politics of the respective States, is, to my mind, puerile and worthless. I do not fear the people. They can be trusted, sir. If they desire to elect the United States Senator by their direct vote, give them the right to compel it, and rest assured they will attain it. Revolutions of this character never turn backward, and once settled in favor of the people they will never relinquish that right. No one need fear the people. Experience has taught us that the great body of the plain people can always be relied upon. The lust of money and the lust of power may corrupt the individual and dry up the fountains of patriotism and love of country, but the great mass of the plain people—the honest, virtuous, patriotic, toiling masses—can always be relied upon. To enlarge their powers in the affairs of government is to enlarge their sense of individual responsibility and renew the fires of patriotism.

Sir, I shall vote for the majority report to enlarge the power of the people, with perfect confidence in the wisdom, integrity, and virtue of my fellow-countrymen. [Applause.]

[Mr. SNODGRASS addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. RYAN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, the bill now before the House to amend the Constitution of our country is worthy of the best thought and careful consideration of a legislative body. For myself I hesitate to add to or take from that sacred instrument of rights which for more than a century has served so well the purposes of the greatest Republic of the world. From childhood the American people have revered the Constitution, which insured the blessings of liberty to the people of this country. But, in the language of the majority report, I am not unmindful of the veneration of the people for this great instrument, or wanting in appreciation for the memory of the illustrious men whose enduring monument is this greatest charter of national life and individual liberty.

The framers of the Constitution, believing that useful alterations would be suggested by experience, provided by Article V of the Constitution for amendments and the course to be pursued. The conditions, in some respects, under which our Constitution was framed have changed, and to meet emergencies, keep apace with the onward march of progress and time, our Constitution should be amended, and, in whatever part found weak, strengthened. I regard it as the duty of this House and the people of the country to strengthen every link in the chain of our Constitution whenever it appears that the same may be necessary.

The committee, Mr. Speaker, in charge of this bill unanimously agreed that a change should be made in the manner of electing United States Senators, and they are supported in their views by the people of more than thirty States of the Union, all of whom have petitioned for an amendment to the Constitution whereby United States Senators may be elected by the direct vote of the people.

The right of the people to petition the Government for a redress of grievances is a right conferred by the Constitution, and has never passed unheeded by an American Congress.

The amendment proposed, Mr. Chairman, charges the people of our country with the right to elect United States Senators, and strips them of the power to delegate that right to others. Under the present system the United States Senators are elected, not by the people, but by their representatives in the State legislature.

The framers of our Constitution concluded that representative government was the best form of government, and no doubt they were right in their conclusions, under the conditions then existing.

But, Mr. Speaker, the people in more than thirty States of our great Union have petitioned for this amendment, and believe that the stability and great progress of our country for more than a century past warrant this change, and that it will inure to the improvement of our form of government.

Mr. Speaker, this is not a new proposition. It was urged by several of the framers of the Constitution that the right to elect United States Senators should be lodged in the people and not in their representatives.

An examination of Madison's Reports on the Debates in the Federal Constitution shows that no serious objection was made against the right of the people to elect United States Senators.

At that time a great difference of opinion existed as to the apportionment and manner of electing Senators, one part of the Convention, headed by Hamilton, Madison, Wilson, and Morris, advocating the election of Senators by the people, and representation apportioned on the basis of population.

This was most earnestly objected to by Patterson, Lansing, and Martin, representatives of the smaller and less populated States, for the reason that the larger and more thickly populated States would have a greater number of representatives; and as United States Senators are representatives of States, not of individuals, each State should have an equal voice.

While this great battle of the question of representation was being debated, Sherman, Franklin, and Gerry were most active, and eventually successful, in effecting a compromise between the contending parties, which culminated in the final adoption of section 4, Article I, of the Constitution, which provided for the election of United States Senators by the respective legislatures and equal representation from each State of the Union.

From an examination of this question, it seems apparent that it was originally intended to leave to the citizens of each State the right to determine when, where, and in what manner the election of Senators should be held; that the exception and restriction to the legislature was the result of a compromise and contrary to the best judgment of the great constitutional lawyers, members of Congress, including Hamilton and Jefferson.

And now, Mr. Speaker, I take pleasure in quoting the Hon. James Wilson, of Pennsylvania, who had the honor of representing the old Keystone State on the floor of the first Continental Congress of our country, and who with other patriots had the manhood and courage, in the then trying times, to declare "that these united colonies are, and of right ought to be, free and independent States." In his advocacy of the election of United States Senators by the direct vote of the people he said:

I am in favor of raising the Federal pyramid to a considerable altitude, and for that reason I wish to give it as broad a base as possible. No government can long subsist without the confidence of the people.

And with like pride, Mr. Speaker, I call the attention of this House to the words of Hon. James Madison, of Virginia, who so ably and patriotically participated in the construction of the Constitution of our country. In his contention for the election of United States Senators by the direct vote of the people he—thought the great fabric to be raised would be more stable and durable if it should rest on the solid foundation of the people themselves than if it should stand merely on the pillars of the legislatures.

The wisdom of Wilson, Madison, Hamilton, Jefferson, and others has been fully borne out by events, and to-day the State which I have the honor in part to represent has petitioned this body for an amendment to the Constitution whereby United States Senators may be elected by the direct vote of the people. The resolution passed by the legislature of the State of Pennsylvania not only fully evidences the prevailing sentiment of the people of Pennsylvania but the country at large, and should exercise much influence in the favorable consideration of the proposed amendment. I now, Mr. Speaker, most respectfully submit the same:

Resolution adopted by the legislature of Pennsylvania, providing for the appointment of a committee to confer with the legislatures of the other States of the Union, regarding an amendment to the Constitution of the United States which shall provide for the election of United States Senators by popular vote.

Whereas it is evident, judging by the tone of the public press, as well as by the resolutions of the State legislatures and the resolutions passed year after year by the national House of Representatives, that a majority of the American people desire a change in the Constitution whereby they may elect the President, Vice-President, and United States Senators by direct popular vote: Therefore, be it

Resolved (if the senate concur), That a committee of five, two from the senate and three from the house, be appointed to confer with the legislatures of other States of the Union with the view of bringing about the submission of an amendment to secure the desired result, this committee to report to the legislature in 1901, and not to incur expenses to exceed $500 for the two years.

JERE B. REX,
Chief Clerk of the House of Representatives.

The foregoing resolution concurred in.

E. W. SMILEY,
Chief Clerk of the Senate.

Approved the 6th day of April, A. D. 1899.

WILLIAM A. STONE.

The amount authorized to be expended is written in figures instead of letters. The amount is $500, and I approve the resolution with this understanding.

WILLIAM A. STONE.

In addition to the foregoing this Congress has been appealed to through similar resolutions and memorials by the States of Arkansas, California, Colorado, Florida, Idaho, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, Kansas, Kentucky, Louisiana, Michigan, Minnesota, Mississippi, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, New Hampshire, North Carolina, North Dakota, Ohio, Oregon, Utah, Washington, Wisconsin, and Wyoming.

One of the primary objects of Government is the welfare and happiness of its people, as clearly demonstrated by the beneficent effect of our own Constitution, and that happiness and welfare can best be maintained through the direct action of the citizen as the sovereign. [Applause.]

It is, therefore, Mr. Speaker, incumbent upon this House to respond to the numerous petitions presented by the different States, especially when we take into consideration the corrupt means and influences resorted to by ambitious and unscrupulous men to obtain a seat in the United States Senate. But it has been said that the people are just as liable to make mistakes in the selection of Senators as are the legislatures. This view I apprehend is held but by a small number; and, Mr. Speaker, if held by any now occupying a seat in the United States Senate, the question may be asked, Why do you fear the judgment of your constituency? What wrong have you committed that you fear condemnation? Are these the questions he fears to answer? If so, he should not now occupy a seat in the Senate of the United States, and the sooner this amendment becomes a part of the Constitution the better for the country, the Senate, and the Senator.

Why this alarm? The people of his State, so well qualified to elect municipal and State officers and judges of the highest judicial power of the Commonwealth, will make no mistake at the polls in passing a just and proper judgment upon him.

It can not be said that the citizens of the respective States are less capable of choosing proper representatives, or that they are more susceptible to corrupt influences, than the legislatures. It must be admitted that there are many men in every State of the Union fully competent to represent the State in the Senate of the United States, and if the power were placed with the people to elect, the intrigues of the ambitious, the bribes of the rich, and the machine rule of political factions would pass away, the honest will of the people recorded, and the "characteristic policy of republican government" fully established.

More than one hundred years past, when the framers of our Constitution deliberated upon this question, fully conscious of the gravity of the work to be assigned to the highest legislative body of our nation, thought that the United States Senate should be composed of the most capable and conservative, and expressed apprehension of the ability of the people to judge. Roger Sherman, to whom the people of his country owe much, for his able and faithful services, in speaking of the people, said: "They want information, and are constantly liable to be misled," and for that reason insisted that Senators should be elected by the legislatures. Such may have been the conditions over one hundred years ago, but they do not exist now.

Again, Mr. Speaker, when the clause providing for the election of the President of the United States by the National Legislature was under discussion, in speaking of the people he said:

The latter will never be sufficiently informed of characters, and besides will never give a majority of votes to any one man. They will generally vote for some man in their own State, and the largest State will have the best chance for the appointment.

But such are not the conditions to-day.

And again, Mr. Speaker, Mr. Dickinson, whose error of mind, not of heart, all American citizens are pleased to overlook, moved in the convention—

That the members of the second branch (the Senate) ought to be chosen by the individual legislatures—

And said he had two reasons for this motion:

First, because the sense of the States would be better collected through their government than immediately from the people at large; second, because he wished the Senate to consist of the most distinguished characters—distinguished for their rank in life and their weight of property—and bearing as strong a likeness to the British House of Lords as possible, and he thought such characters more likely to be selected by the State legislatures than in any other mode.

How striking the illustration that "great men are not always wise." Yet, if we were to judge men by mistakes and erroneous opinions only, injustice would be done. We judge the founders of our Constitution by their best work, and they are deserving of the rare honor which alone belong to the founders of empires. But, Mr. Speaker, there is no longer ground for apprehension. The conditions then perchance existing do not confront us now.

The efficiency of our public-school system and institutions of learning can not be questioned; and the intelligence of the American people as a nation is admitted the world over. Before the war of independence there were but 9 colleges in the United States, while to-day there are 400, and our common and public schools are located in every city, town, and township within our country. One hundred years ago but few newspapers were published in the United States. In 1775 there were only 37 newspapers and periodicals; and the first daily newspaper issued in this country was the American Daily Advertiser, published in Philadelphia in 1784. To-day there are about 2,000 daily papers, and of the other issues some 18,000.

This, coupled with the general thirst for reading and knowledge, especially fit the American people for self-government in its entirety, for the education of the masses is the crowning glory of our country and her only reliable safeguard. Such is the intelligence of our people to-day that they are conversant with all great political questions, and I have unbounded faith in their ability to exercise all the rights which the proposed amendment offers. I hail with delight the opportunity to advocate the adoption of this measure, and place in the hands of the people, where it properly belongs, the right to elect United States Senators.

I have no doubt of the ability of the people of Pennsylvania to exercise all the rights under the proposed amendment, and, if given the opportunity, will demonstrate to the country the wisdom of the legislation. A vacancy now exists in Pennsylvania, for the legislature, while in session, failed to elect. Under the Constitution, when vacancies occur it is provided that they shall be filled temporarily by the appointment of the governor prior to the convening of the State's legislature and the election of a Senator at the first session thereof.

Never in the history of the Senate, it can be creditably said, has that body seated a person seeking admission by appointment from the governor after the legislature of the States had failed to elect.

Senator Conkling, in discussing the right to fill vacancies where the legislature failed to elect, said that—

The governor of a State and his friends, by cabal, intrigue, and maneuver, may so arrange that the legislature will decide not to elect or would fail to elect, in order that the governor might gather to himself the power to fill the vacancy.

And I have no doubt but many of the most reputable citizens of the State of Pennsylvania have implicit faith in the statement of that honored gentleman.

To-day, through the failure of legislatures to elect Senators, three vacancies exist—namely, in Pennsylvania, Delaware, and Utah—while I venture to say that if the right to elect were placed with the people, not one of the States named would be without a full representation.

After a trial, Mr. Speaker, of over one hundred years it has been demonstrated clearly to the people of the United States that the present system of electing United States Senators does not carry with it the intent and purpose of the Constitution. Hamilton said:

Among independent and sovereign States, bound together by a simple league, the parties, however unequal in size, ought to have an equal share in the common councils.

It can not be contended that all the States possess that equality intended by the Constitution when at this time three vacancies exist through the failure of the respective legislatures to elect. An examination of the records of the Senate give evidence of the failure of the present system and in some cases the absolute failure of State legislatures to carry out the will of the people and the spirit of the Constitution. As proof of this statement, John Kusey, of Delaware, was refused a seat in the Third Congress because a session of the legislature had intervened between the time of the expiration of his term and prior to his appointment.

Samuel S. Phelps, Senator from Vermont, was refused admission on appointment by the governor, for the reason that subsequent to the appointment and prior to the meeting of the Senate a session of the legislature had intervened. (Volume 28, Congressional Globe, part 1, first session Thirty-third Congress.)

In the same Congress Jarrett W. Williams was refused a seat under like circumstances as those of Senator Phelps. (Volume 28, part 3, Congressional Globe, page 2208.)

In the Twenty-fourth Congress James Harlan, Senator from Iowa, was refused admission because a majority of both bodies of the legislature were not present at the joint convention. (Congressional Globe, third session Twenty-fourth Congress, 260.)

In the Thirty-eighth Congress the State of Arkansas was deprived of representation in the United States Senate because the legislature was not legally organized. (Senate Journal, Thirty-eighth Congress, and second session Thirty-ninth Congress.)

Henry P. Dupont, of Delaware, was refused a seat in the Fifty-fourth Congress because the vote that elected him was not a legal vote under the constitution of that State.

Lee Mantle, of Montana, was refused admission into the Fifty-third Congress under an appointment by the governor of that State because a session of the legislature had intervened between the time of the expiration of his term and the date of his appointment; and Henry W. Corbett, of Oregon, was refused admission into the Fifty-fifth Congress under an appointment by the governor of Oregon upon the ground that the legislature, while it had refused to organize, had met and failed to elect.

It seems apparent, Mr. Speaker, that too frequently have legislatures failed to carry out the purpose of the Constitution, whereby all States may enjoy the equality to which they are entitled; that the right to elect United States Senators should be placed in the hands of the people. With the adoption of the proposed amendment all States will enjoy fully the rights intended by the Constitution and the will of the people honestly recorded, for they will never willfully betray themselves. [Applause.]

Mr. RUCKER. I now yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER].

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, the joint resolution now before the House and under discussion proposes to amend the Constitution so that Senators in Congress shall be elected directly by the people. I am in favor of the people electing United States Senators. Ever since I have been a member of this House I have worked faithfully to bring about this desirable reform. I introduced this joint resolution in the Fifty-fourth Congress, I introduced it in the Fifty-fifth Congress, and I reintroduced it the first day of this Congress. It passed this House by an almost unanimous vote in the last Congress, but failed to pass the Senate. For years, in Congress and out of Congress, in season and out of season, I have favored, discussed, and agitated this proposition. I believe it is right. I know the people favor it, and I hope every member of this House will now vote for it. The people all over this country demand this change in the Constitution and appeal to us to pass this resolution to give them this right.

This appeal is not sectional, nor is it partisan. It reaches us from all sections and from the different political parties with a degree of unanimity quite surprising and unaccountable, if not guided and impelled by a sense of righteous indignation, aroused by reports and accusations of alleged methods sometimes employed by gentlemen whose ambitions lead them to seek a seat in the Senate of the United States. We can well afford, indeed, as their representatives it is our bounden duty, to respect the wishes and do the will of the people and give them a uniform law allowing them by direct vote to elect their Senators.

It has been said that our action in passing this resolution will be useless and a waste of time, for the reason that the Senators will never consent to a change in the mode of their selection. That may be true in regard to some of the Senators, but I know it is not true in regard to all of them. Many of them favor this change and will advocate it. I know also that this resolution may fail this time, as it has failed to pass the Senate before, but those who believe in this change will not give up the struggle to bring it about, and sooner or later it will be adopted.

If a majority of Senators oppose the adoption of this resolution in this Congress and, from personal motives, mistaken ideas, or narrow-minded views, vote it down, the agitation of the people for this change will not cease, but will become more pronounced and more determined until there is a Senate that will respond to their wishes and enact legislation that will give the people the right to elect their United States Senators as well as their Representatives in Congress. Do not be deceived; make no mistake. This reform is growing more popular every year and is destined to come in the near future. I trust it will come this year and that the Senate will concur in the judgment of this House before this Congress adjourns.

In recent years there has been much scandal in several States regarding the election of United States Senators by the State legislatures. These scandalous elections are becoming more flagrant and more frequent. The adoption of this amendment will prevent corruption, stop scandal, and to a great extent eliminate the temptation to gerrymander for partisan purposes.

Let me say to this House that this legislative gerrymandering has been carried further by the Republican party in my own State of New York than perhaps any other State in the Union. In the State of New York, under the present outrageous Republican apportionment, the people can not secure a Democratic legislature unless the Democratic party carries the State by at least a plurality of 100,000 votes.

The Republicans in their partisanship went so far that they wrote in our State constitution a provision that no matter what the population of Greater New York should be, no matter if it were twice as large as the population in the rest of the State, the city of Greater New York should never have more than one-half the members in the upper branch of our State legislature.

I believe the change in our Federal Constitution sought to be made by this resolution will almost entirely prevent these unfair and outrageous apportionments and at the same time give the poor man the same opportunity under the law as the wealthy one to submit his cause and his candidacy to the arbitrament of the people for the high and honorable office of a Senator in Congress.

I favor this change in the Constitution, as I shall every other that will restore the Government to the control of the people. I want the people, in fact as well as in theory, to rule this great Republic and the Government to be directly responsible and immediately responsive to their will. I believe in the people, and I trust the people. In my judgment, the people can and ought to be trusted.

If the people can not be trusted, if they can be corrupted, coerced, influenced, or intimidated, then representative government is a failure and the free institutions of the Republic are doomed. We must rely on the people, and we should legislate at all times in their interest.

With the adoption of this amendment to the Constitution it will be impossible to defeat the will of the people, and the vacancies that are now too frequent in the Senate and occupy the time and attention of that body would never occur.

Mr. Speaker, there is a rapidly growing sentiment all over the country in favor of this change in the mode of electing Senators in Congress. It is a most important question to the people, and the Senate will make a sad mistake if it attempts to ignore it.

The legislatures of thirty-four States have formally indorsed this proposed amendment to the Constitution, and I firmly believe, if the Senate will now pass it, that every State in the Union will speedily ratify it, and it will become a part of the supreme law of the land. The people are in earnest in this matter and any attempt to thwart their will in securing this reform will only hasten its consummation.

I am opposed to delegating away the rights of the people, and where they have been delegated I would restore them to the people. For one hundred years and more the distrust of the people by some of the founders of the Republic, as embodied in our Federal Constitution, has stood as fixed and immutable as the laws of the Medes and the Persians.

I am a friend of the Constitution and share in the patriotic sentiment which is prompt to challenge almost every proposition to amend it. But, sir, I sincerely believe the man who would boldly point out the defects in our great Magna Charta and honestly seek to remedy them is a better friend of the Constitution than he who will not see its faults, or, seeing them, endeavors to justify them from motives of mistaken zeal.

The right to elect United States Senators by the people is a step in advance and in the right direction. I hope it will speedily be brought about. It is the right kind of reform, in the interest of the many and for the benefit of all the people, and its accomplishment will keep the Government nearer the masses and herald a better and a brighter day in the onward march of the Republic. [Applause.]

Mr. RUCKER. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL].

[Mr. SMALL addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. RUCKER. I now yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD].

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, any question is important which proposes to change the Constitution of the United States. That time-honored instrument, so perfectly wrought out and so nearly adapted as a complete foundation for the establishment of free government, is perhaps the greatest instrument which man hath produced. In considering the proposition before us to-day it might be well to inquire into the conditions existing at the time of the adoption of the Constitution and contrast them with the environments of this day. At that time the Continental Congress, which had so admirably conducted the affairs of state during the Revolutionary war, was chosen by the legislatures of the several States. In the States themselves the governors, judges, and other officers were named by the legislature. In some instances they went so far as to name the county officers through the same source. Popular election meant simply the selection of a legislative body for the State.

With these conditions existing and so much good having resulted from the legislative bodies, both of the States and the Continental Congress, it was natural that many of its provisions should be introduced in the Constitution which was to serve as the foundation for National Government. The members of the Continental Congress itself were chosen by the legislatures and received their credentials from them very much as the Senators now receive them from the States. It is not strange, then, that, emerging from the war of Independence with the method of government then existing, they should fail to see the danger that would lie in the path of such a system.

The men of that period were statesmen of unusual force and character. The pictures that come to us in stone or bronze or exhibited on canvas present individuals strong, intellectual, deeply furrowed with the cares and responsibilities of life. They present an appearance of sublimity that to me is awe-inspiring. These sages read of Greece and Rome in their efforts to be free. They were students of literature and were versed in history of mankind in its effort to establish free government. They had some help in their work; a few examples and precedents could be found; but most of them had met the sad fate of decay and could only serve to warn them to avoid the mistakes which lead to their ruin. No men ever engaged in nobler task.

History produces none upon whom so much depended. Here were States to be retained in the enjoyment of their sovereign rights and a compact to be formed which would unite in one sisterhood of States. The three departments of government are to be separate and distinct and each to enjoy their proper functions, and it was desired that the people should in all respects be supreme. How admirably they brought order out of chaos in this work. We laud the heroes of the Revolution who, amid blood and carnage, achieved so much for the world, and we can not praise them too highly. But the civil heroes who, after the ruins of war, amid the factions and discord which followed, framed a Government which served to perpetuate the enjoyment of the freedom gained are alike entitled to our greatest admiration. Washington the statesman is as much to be honored and revered as Washington the general. The works accomplished are as enduring as any that could be brought by force of arms. It has been said by one of the greatest statesmen of Europe that the American Constitution is the most perfect scheme of civil government ever devised by human wisdom.

The Convention, when it came to consider the question of choosing Senators, had different views, but naturally, with the experiences through which they had just passed, would adopt the method of selection by the State legislatures. Different views were then maintained, however. Mr. Wilson, as is shown by the Madison Papers, said, in the discussion of the matter:

> If we are to establish a National Government, that Government ought to flow from the people at large. If one branch of it should be chosen by the legislatures and the other by the people, the two branches will rest on different grounds and dissension will naturally arise between them. I wish the Senators to be elected by the people, as well as the other branch.

Robert Morris fully indorsed this position. The distribution of the power of government was justly regarded by the framers of our fundamental law as one of the greatest safeguards of liberty. By the proper distribution of power the tendency toward centralization or absolutism could be checked.

It is for this purpose that this amendment to the Constitution is proposed. In what I may say on this occasion I wish it to be understood that I have no intention of reflecting upon any individuals occupying positions in the other end of this Capitol. While much has been said by the press of the country, and many charges of fraud and corruption have been made against individuals who have found place in that body, it is not my purpose to reiterate these charges nor to say anything that would reflect upon the honor or dignity of any member of that body. I believe that most men are honest and that as a rule charges made against public men have but little foundation in fact. If anything can be done which will tend to satisfy the public mind and to remove the idea prevalent that fraudulent methods are frequently adopted to secure and retain office, I am pleased to encourage it and secure its adoption.

Under the Constitution this great fabric of government has placed only one division of the legislative branch under the direct control of the people. The President is selected through electors chosen by the people. After his induction into office he names the chiefs of Departments and heads of bureaus, who have in charge the great machinery of the Government, subject to the confirmation of the Senate. The United States court, whose members are practically appointed for life, are named by the Executive and confirmed by the Senate, so that in neither the executive nor judiciary branches of government do the people make direct selection. The lower House of Congress alone has its indorsement from them.

When adversity has come to the nation and the fearful curse of war has threatened the country, the people have rallied to the support of the flag and have given their lives as a ransom for the maintenance of national honor and glory. The citizen soldiery has been its bulwark—the invincible power that has brought to the attention of the world the devotion and valor of the constitutional sovereigns, the people themselves. Not the privileged few, nor yet the favored by birth and fortune, but the people have saved the nation from destruction, have fought its battles, enlarged its borders, and have rescued liberty from the grasp of every designing enemy.

Can it now be said that these defenders of home and country can not be trusted; that wisdom will not follow their deliberation; that their action will be hasty and inconsiderate? These heroes of field and plain, these victors on land and sea, these bearers of the triumphant flag now ask that they have the privilege of controlling the legislative branch of the Government. Who shall say they shall not? Who is so lost to the principles of free government and the necessity of recognizing the people as to deny this request? From over thirty State legislatures, from every part of the country, through farmers' organizations, labor unions, and popular conventions this purpose has been expressed.

This proposition does meet with opposition but from what source? Who is it that says you can not trust the people in this important function? What class of our citizens is fearful of the consequences of leaving the control of the lawmaking branch of government in the hands of the people? My own observation is that aggregate wealth and corporate monopoly, with their agents and attorneys, are the prime factors in this attempt to defeat the popular will. Of course the Senator who secures his position by improper means resents it. If fraud has entered into his methods and has brought success to him, he would rather risk the smaller body than to submit his claims to the voters of his State. He who feels that the people are not in sympathy with his political methods would likely oppose it. But the people of all classes, high and low, capitalist and laborer, in office or out of it, who are in real sympathy with a government of the people are in favor of yielding to this demand for legislative control. When you find an individual contending against this system, you can almost safely inquire, What private claim does he represent, to whom has he sold his birthright, and who is the master to whom he owes allegiance?

The proposed amendment to the Constitution does not detract from the power of the State legislatures, the State itself, or from the prestige of the Senator when chosen. The representative of this honorable and select branch of the American Congress would be permitted to throw down his commission upon the Clerk's desk and ask the oath of office with the proud realization that it came from the people of the Commonwealth he expects to represent. It seems to me that nothing could be coveted, save the position of Chief Executive, that could be considered a greater honor than to thus represent the people.

The opposition to this measure, however, in other years has asserted itself in the other end of this Capitol. Resolutions of this character have been pigeonholed there ever since the Fortyninth Congress. Frequently this body has asserted the people's will and passed a bill similar to that presented by the minority at this time. But in the Senate archives these important resolutions have slept the sleep of banishment and darkness. Does this lessen our obligations? Shall we crawl in the dust of compromise and concession in order to secure the passage of a measure which would fail to accomplish the desired purpose? Not so.

Unless we can secure the legislation desired by the people, let the ancient and time-honored instrument, framed by our fathers with such consummate wisdom, remain untouched. The report of the majority proposes to make concession to secure action elsewhere, by giving to the States the option of selection of their Senators according to the present method or by direct vote of the people. It seems to me this would defeat the real purpose of the measure, for the result would be that in those States where corruption and fraud are now resorted to to secure the preferment of men who, by their wealth or connection with great moneyed interests, are enabled to control the legislatures, would use their methods to prevent the people from enjoying the benefits of the proposed amendment.

It is surprising that the same objection that is made to-day against this measure of popular favor was made in the Continental Convention when the method of selection of Senators was first discussed. Mr. Gerry, as is shown by the Madison Papers, then said:

He was opposed to the view of Mr. Wilson, who was in favor of electing by direct vote of the people, that the commercial and moneyed interests would be more secure in the hands of the State legislatures than of the people at large.

Tacitly admitting that all other interests would be safer in the hands of the people. The real objection then, as now, is that you can not safely rely upon the people's choice. A great Senator, in discussing this measure in the Senate in 1893, said:

I am not afraid to say to the American people that it is dangerous to trust any great power of government to their direct or inconsiderate control. I am not afraid to tell them not only that their sober second thought is better than their hasty action, but that a government which is exposed to the hasty action of a people is the worst and not the best government on earth.

This expresses the real animus of the opposition, and well illustrates what is feared by them.

Shall we not do what the people desire? Let us say to the petition of the laborer, "We have heard your call and take the initial step you ask;" to the farmer be it said, "Your wishes have been considered and your request has been granted." Shall we not say to all classes that their demand on us shall be met, and thus do our duty here by sending to the Senate a resolution providing for the election of Senators by direct vote of the people? [Applause.]

Mr. RUCKER. I now yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. RIDGELY].

[Mr. RIDGELY addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. RUCKER. I now yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McDOWELL].

[Mr. McDOWELL addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. RUCKER. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ROBB].

Mr. ROBB. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of and shall vote for the substitute proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, providing for the election of United States Senators by a direct vote of the people of the several States. Any power which properly belongs to the people and which can be exercised by them, I think, ought to be exercised by them. No man can give a satisfactory reason why the people should not elect their representatives to any office, whether it be to the office of United States Senator, or a member of this House, or a member of any other legislative body. The nearer you bring home to the people the election of their officers the more directly those officers will feel their responsibility and obligations to the people.

I think the amendment to the Constitution as provided by this substitute will insure at all times the election of a United States Senator. There can be no deadlocks and failures to elect when the people, the sovereign power in the several States, are given the right to vote directly for Senators. It will also insure us against fraud and corruption entering into these elections, and purify the political atmosphere now in some instances surrounding elections to that high office. It will elevate the dignity of the United States Senate in the estimation of the country, and make those who have been or who may be honored by this high office more responsive to the voice of the people.

The resolution provides that—

The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, who shall be elected by a direct vote of the people thereof for a term of six years, and each Senator shall have one vote. A plurality of the votes cast for candidates for Senator shall be sufficient to elect. The electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislatures, respectively.

When a vacancy happens, by death, resignation, or otherwise, in the representation of any State in the Senate, the same shall be filled for the unexpired term thereof in the same manner as is provided for the election of Senators in paragraph 1: Provided, That the executive thereof may make temporary appointment until the next general or special election, in accordance with the statutes or constitution of such State.

This amendment shall not be so construed as to affect the election or term of any Senator chosen before it becomes valid as a part of the Constitution.

The purpose of the resolution is to change the fundamental law so that the people may exercise the power which they now delegate to the legislature.

Except as to the mode of election and filling vacancies, no other change is proposed, and the relation of Senators to their States and to the several departments of the Government will remain unaffected.

The question before us is not a new one. An amendment of this kind was proposed during the first session of the Fiftieth Congress, which convened December, 1887. Since that time many similar resolutions have been offered, and some have passed this House by an almost unanimous vote. This was but a just response to the almost universal popular demand for the change.

The great masses are in earnest upon this question, and, in obedience to their emphatic demands, the legislatures of 34 of the 45 States have passed resolutions requesting Congress to submit an amendment for ratification such as is now proposed. And why should it not be done? Are not the people of the State the sovereign authority of that State, and ought they not to have the right to say directly by their votes who they desired should represent them and their State in the United States Senate? Why compel them to delegate to some one else the power to do that which properly belongs to them as a sovereign right, and which they are demanding that they be allowed to exercise? Who is afraid to trust the people? He who is should not be trusted by the people.

Thomas Jefferson, the great apostle of Democracy, the founder and father of the Democratic party, the greatest statesman of this country, and who wrote the immortal Declaration of Independence, declared:

I am not among those who fear the people.

Had he been a member of the convention which framed our Federal Constitution he would have stood where George Washington, James Madison, Edmund Randolph, George Mason, and John Blair stood—in favor of giving to the people of the States the right to elect Senators by a direct vote.

It is not enough for us to say the Senate will not pass this resolution; that similar resolutions at other times have failed to receive its favorable consideration. We should join with the people of nearly every State in the Union in making this demand. We should unite with them our protest against a system which has been abused and corrupted and which deprives them of the sovereign right of American citizenship. The people are in earnest and they are determined. Every year adds strength to the movement and the time is not far distant when this amendment will be adopted.

In an able speech made upon this subject in the House of Representatives on May 11, 1898, by Hon. WILLIAM A. JONES, a distinguished Representative from the Commonwealth of Virginia, in referring to the earnest demand of the people for this change and the refusal of the Senate to pass the resolution, he said:

But, despairing of any immediate relief by reason of the refusal of the Senate itself to submit this amendment to a popular vote of the States, the voters in many of the States have discovered a means by which they may accomplish indirectly what they are not permitted to do directly. In many of the States there are held Senatorial primary elections, in some of which they are held under the sanction of statutory enactments, whilst in others they are protected only by such regulations and safeguards as may be provided by the political organizations resorting to this method of securing an expression of the popular will.

In no State where such a device has been employed has it ever been abandoned. On the contrary, in States where these primaries were originally held simply under party regulations they grew so rapidly in popular favor that legislative acts have been passed and special statutes enacted prescribing the methods by which they should be held. In some States the legislatures have merely legalized the holding of party primaries; in others they have made it obligatory as to many of the offices to be filled. In Florida, for instance, an act has recently been passed merely legalizing Senatorial and other primaries, whilst in South Carolina the primary system, which has worked so satisfactorily in that State, is now made obligatory by statute.

To quote the language of the junior Senator from that State:

"The primary in our State is the outgrowth of a popular demand. * * * It may not suit the politicians, but it suits a large majority of the people of South Carolina, and has become a fixture."

In Georgia, Arkansas, Nebraska, and other States the Democrats have adopted primary systems by which the Democratic voters indicate their choice for Senators; and so strong a sentiment upon this subject prevails in Texas that all of the Democrats who thus far have announced their intention to become candidates before the legislature which is to fill the next vacancy in the Senate from that State have publicly declared their willingness to submit their claims to a Senatorial primary, to be held under the auspices of the Democratic executive committee of that State.

Even more recently, indeed only this year, the legislature of Illinois, in response to an irresistible public demand, has enacted a statute providing a complete primary system applicable to the nomination of candidates for all public offices in that State and for the Congress of the United States. This act makes the holding of these party primaries imperative in all counties containing 125,000 inhabitants, but it is only to apply to such other communities as shall adopt this act upon its being submitted to their legal voters.

The primary system enlarges the power of the people, gives them a direct vote on the question involved, and hence it is popular with them.

Mr. Speaker, numerous considerations have been productive of this dissatisfaction on the part of the people with the present system.

First. It is a reflection upon their honesty and intelligence, and amounts to a declaration that it is unsafe and prejudicial to the public interest to empower them to elect by a direct vote their representative in the United States Senate. It is an abridgment of the right of suffrage by depriving the individual voter of the right to vote for the man of his choice.

Second. The charges of fraud and corruption and bribery, by means of which it is claimed and believed elections have been secured to the United States Senate, has excited in their minds just apprehensions as to the character of the men and the kind of services which will be performed by those elected by such methods.

Third. The serious effect upon the business of the State legislatures resulting from the contests, lasting sometimes through an entire session, and in some cases even then without successful termination, and the corrupting influences resulting from the intrigues, manipulation, and lavish expenditure of money. Not only are the material interests of the State seriously affected by these protracted Senatorial struggles, but often a State is denied its proper representation in the United States Senate by reason of the failure of the legislature to elect.

I might call attention, in this connection, to the States of Washington, Wyoming, Montana, Oregon, Kentucky, and Delaware, where the legislatures failed to elect. There are now three States without their proper representation in the United States Senate as the result of this pernicious and undemocratic system. And but recently it was solemnly resolved, by a unanimous vote of the Senate committee having the subject under consideration, that the person holding a certificate from the great State of Montana was not entitled to his seat as a United States Senator, by reason of the improper expenditure of an unusually large sum of money in procuring his election. The public trust has been abused and the public confidence shaken in the integrity of many of these elections.

Although the growth of public sentiment in favor of this amendment to the Federal Constitution has been rapid and pronounced, it is not to be wondered at in view of the recent experiences of many of the State legislatures and the suspicions surrounding some of these elections.

But however this may be, Mr. Speaker, whether it is to have little or great weight in the consideration of this question, outside of, above, and beyond this is the right of the people to rule; and if we are to rise to the true grandeur of "an absolutely free and independent representative government," this restriction should be removed and the authority to elect placed where it properly belongs—in the hands of the people.

When this question was under consideration in the Constitutional Convention, Mr. Madison declared that he "thought that the great fabric to be raised would be more stable and durable if it should rest on the solid foundation of the people themselves than if it should stand merely on the pillars of the legislatures." James Wilson, of Pennsylvania, in advocating elections by the people, said: "I am in favor of raising the Federal pyramid to a considerable altitude, and for that reason I wish to give it as broad a base as possible. No government can long subsist without the confidence of the people."

Mr. Speaker, this movement of the people is in the interest of the people, and the resolution should be passed and submitted to the States for their ratification if this Republic is to be in fact what it professes to be in name, "a government of the people, by the people, and for the people."

Mr. RUCKER. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES].

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to occupy even the two minutes granted me. My own record upon this question has been made and is well known. I simply want to say that the legislature of Virginia since the beginning of this year has passed, with only two dissenting votes, a resolution instructing its representatives in the Senate of the United States to vote for an amendment to the Constitution which shall provide for the election of Senators of the United States by the direct vote of the people.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, before the debate is closed on this resolution, I desire unanimous consent to withdraw the resolution heretofore offered by the minority of the committee, and to have read and considered as pending, in lieu of the resolution heretofore offered, the resolution which I send to the desk.

Mr. CORLISS. This resolution might be printed in the RECORD, to be considered as offered in lieu of the substitute.

Mr. POWERS. And as pending.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] withdraws the amendment heretofore offered and offers as a substitute therefor the amendment which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That in lieu of the first paragraph of section 3 of Article I of the Constitution of the United States, and in lieu of so much of paragraph 2 of the same section as relates to the filling of vacancies, the following be proposed as an amendment to the Constitution, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as a part of the Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States:

"The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, who shall be elected by a direct vote of the people thereof for a term of six years, and each Senator shall have one vote. A plurality of the votes cast for candidates for Senator shall be sufficient to elect. The electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislatures, respectively.

"When a vacancy happens, by death, resignation, or otherwise, in the representation of any State in the Senate, the same shall be filled for the unexpired term thereof in the same manner as is provided for the election of Senators in paragraph 1: Provided, That the executive thereof may make temporary appointment until the next general or special election, in accordance with the statutes or constitution of such State."

This amendment shall not be so construed as to affect the election or term of any Senator chosen before it becomes valid as a part of the Constitution.

Mr. CORLISS. I ask that the consent heretofore granted for leave to print be limited to ten days after the passage of the bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understand that general leave to print has been granted without this limitation. On a bill of this kind I do not see any reason for limiting the time. The leave heretofore given was granted when the House was full. I object.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey, by unanimous consent, obtained leave of absence for the residue of this week, on account of important business.

And then, on motion of Mr. DALZELL (at 5 o'clock and 18 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the House, reports of collectors of customs, giving names of importers and articles imported into the United States from Porto Rico since the treaty with Spain, with amounts paid and dates of payment—to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, April 13, 1900.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. BROWNLOW for one week, on account of important business.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] has sent word to the Chair that he wishes to be excused indefinitely, on account of the death of his mother. Without objection, this request will be granted.

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of business on the Private Calendar, under the special rule fixed for Fridays.

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me, under the agreement made in the House on yesterday, to vote on the adoption of the joint resolution which was discussed yesterday afternoon immediately after the reading of the Journal, that that is the special order for this morning, and is first in order.

The SPEAKER. The point made by the gentleman from Michigan is well taken. The Chair had overlooked the fact.

The Clerk will report the title of the joint resolution under consideration on yesterday.

METHOD OF ELECTION OF SENATORS.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution, as follows:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 28) proposing an amendment to the Constitution providing for the election of Senators of the United States.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution reported by the majority, and the substitute of the minority also, be read for the information of the House. They are very short.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Vermont?

There was no objection.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 28) and the proposed substitute were read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following amendments be proposed to the legislatures of the several States, which, when ratified by three-fourths of said legislatures, shall become and be a part of the Constitution, namely: In lieu of the first and second paragraphs of section 3 of Article I of the Constitution of the United States of America, the following shall be proposed as an amendment to the Constitution:

"SEC. 3. The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen for six years, and each Senator shall have one vote. These Senators shall be chosen by the legislatures of the several States unless the people of any State, either through their legislature or by the constitution of the State, shall provide for the election of United States Senators by direct vote of the people; then, in such case, United States Senators shall be elected in such State at large by direct vote of the people; a plurality shall elect, and the electors shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature.

"When vacancies happen, by resignation or otherwise, in the representation of any State, in the Senate, the same shall be filled for the unexpired term thereof in the same manner as is provided for the election of Senators in paragraph 1: Provided, That the legislature of any State may empower the executive thereof to make temporary appointments until the next general election, in accordance with the statutes or constitution of such State."

This amendment shall not be so construed as to affect the election or term of any Senator chosen before it becomes valid as a part of the Constitution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That in lieu of the first paragraph of section 3 of Article I of the Constitution of the United States, and in lieu of so much of paragraph 2 of the same section as relates to the filling of vacancies, the following be proposed as an amendment to the Constitution, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as a part of the Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States:

"The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, who shall be elected by a direct vote of the people thereof for a term of six years, and each Senator shall have one vote. A plurality of the votes cast for candidates for Senator shall be sufficient to elect. The electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislatures, respectively.

"When a vacancy happens, by death, resignation, or otherwise, in the representation of any State in the Senate, the same shall be filled for the unexpired term thereof in the same manner as is provided for the election of Senators in paragraph 1: Provided, That the executive thereof may make temporary appointment until the next general or special election, in accordance with the statutes or constitution of such State."

This amendment shall not be so construed as to affect the election or term of any Senator chosen before it becomes valid as a part of the Constitution.

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will first state the situation in the House. There is the original joint resolution reported from the Committee on the Election of President and Vice-President and Representatives in Congress, which has just been read. To that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] has offered the substitute by way of an amendment, which is the only amendment pending to the original proposition. So that the question now is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri.

For what purpose does the gentleman from Michigan rise?

Mr. CORLISS. I desired simply to have that statement made.

The question being taken on the amendment proposed by Mr. RUCKER, the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. CORLISS demanded a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 135, noes 30.

Mr. CORLISS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. If it be necessary that a two-thirds vote must be had to carry the original proposition, and this being a substitute for that original proposition, then, of course, the substitute would require the same proportion of votes.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Michigan make the point of order?

Mr. CORLISS. I certainly do.

The SPEAKER. A parliamentary inquiry which the gentleman started out with is one thing, and a point of order is quite another.

Mr. CORLISS. I make the point of order.

Mr. MAHON. It is too late to do that.

Mr. POWERS. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that already four-fifths have voted for this amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair holds that in voting upon an amendment it is not necessary for a two-thirds vote, although the original proposition requires it. When the House considers any amendment, it can be voted upon in the usual way; and this proposition of the gentleman from Missouri is but an amendment. When it comes, however, to the passage of the bill, then the point can be made. The Chair overrules the point made by the gentleman from Michigan at this time.

Mr. CORLISS. Will the Chair permit a question?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has decided the matter.

Mr. CORLISS. Then I ask the yeas and nays.

Several MEMBERS. Too late.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, 9 members only rising in favor thereof.

The SPEAKER. The ayes have it, and the amendment is agreed to.

The question is now on the engrossment and third reading of the amended resolution.

The joint resolution as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time.

The question recurred on the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CORLISS. I would like to inquire whether under the ruling of the Chair the original resolution has been amended by simply substituting for it that part of the resolution offered by the gentleman from Missouri, and that now we are voting on the original proposition as amended?

The SPEAKER. That is correct.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 242, nays 15, answered "present" 4, not voting 89; as follows:

So (two-thirds of a quorum voting in favor thereof) the joint resolution was passed.

The Clerk announced the following pairs:

For this session:

Mr. HULL with Mr. HAY.

Until further notice:

Mr. GRAFF with Mr. BRUNDIDGE.

Mr. BARNEY with Mr. ALLEN of Mississippi.

Mr. DAYTON with Mr. MEYER of Louisiana.

Mr. REEVES with Mr. SPARKMAN.

Mr. TOMPKINS with Mr. CROWLEY.

Mr. ESCH with Mr. BAILEY of Texas.

Mr. TAYLER of Ohio with Mr. FOX.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine with Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts with Mr. THAYER.

Mr. HAWLEY with Mr. COOPER of Texas.

Mr. WEYMOUTH with Mr. BROUSSARD.

Mr. BURKETT with Mr. BURKE of Texas.

Mr. LYBRAND with Mr. GASTON.

For two weeks:

Mr. STEWART of New York with Mr. MAY.

To and including April 20:

Mr. OTJEN with Mr. BRENNER.

Until April 21:

Mr. ALDRICH with Mr. BURNETT.

For balance of week:

Mr. HILL of Connecticut with Mr. UNDERHILL.

Until Monday:

Mr. GILLET of New York with Mr. CAMPBELL.

Mr. SHERMAN with Mr. DRIGGS.

Until Monday next, at 2 o'clock:

Mr. BUTLER with Mr. RUPPERT.

For one week:

Mr. MCCALL with Mr. GAINES.

For this day:

Mr. JENKINS with Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey with Mr. FITZGERALD of New York.

Mr. BABCOCK with Mr. RIORDAN.

Mr. ACHESON with Mr. NOONAN.

Mr. YOUNG of Pennsylvania with Mr. GORDON.

Mr. DAHLE of Wisconsin with Mr. BRADLEY.

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. MCCALL. I desire to withdraw my affirmative vote for that reason and to be counted "present."

Mr. DAYTON. I am paired with the gentleman from Louisiana, Mr. MEYER, but have voted in the affirmative on this question. I am informed, and have no doubt, that if General MEYER were present, he would vote in the affirmative also. Therefore I have concluded to let my vote stand, with this explanation.

Mr. MCCULLOCH. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. BRUNDIDGE, is sick and confined to his room, and I ask that he be excused for to-day.

The SPEAKER. That can not be done at this stage of the proceedings.

Mr. ADAMSON. I desire to know if the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. WANGER, has voted?

The SPEAKER. He has not.

Mr. ADAMSON. I desire to state that I had an arrangement with him to-day for a pair, but the gentleman has come in, and with his consent I allow my vote to stand.

Mr. SMALL. I am paired with the gentleman from Maryland, Mr. WACHTER. I am informed that if he were present, he would vote "aye," and therefore I have voted "aye."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman leaves his vote as it is?

Mr. SMALL. Yes.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

NICARAGUA CANAL.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Tuesday, the 1st day of May, the bill H. R. 2538, a bill to provide for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, be made the special order, and that it be taken up for consideration immediately after the approval of the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that House bill 2538 be made the special order for Tuesday, May 1. Is there objection?

Mr. BURTON. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. TERRY. Who objected?

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Who objected?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

S. 3535. An act for the relief of Brooklyn Ferry Company, of New York; and

S. 3488. An act to amend an act fixing the fees of jurors and witnesses in United States courts in certain States and Territories.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 4696) granting an increase of pension to Ruthven W. Houghton.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. BAKER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 2356. An act for the relief of Hiram Johnson and others; and

H. R. 2456. An act for the relief of the heirs of Philip McLoskey and John Hagan.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee as indicated below:

S. 3488. An act to amend an act fixing the fees of jurors and witnesses in the United States courts in certain States and Territories—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar under the special rule.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Hampshire moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of private pension bills. Pending that, the Chair desires to announce that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] will act as Speaker for the balance of this day.

The motion to go into Committee of the Whole was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House, Mr. CAPRON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of private pension bills under the rule. The Clerk will report the first bill.

CORA I. CROMWELL.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1787) to grant a pension to Cora I. Cromwell.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll the name of Cora I. Cromwell, of Green Lake County, Wis., daughter of George Cromwell, late private, Company I, Thirty-first Regiment Wisconsin Infantry Volunteers, and pay her a pension of $12 per month.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

After the word "roll," in line 4, insert the words "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

In line 5 strike out the words "of Green Lake County, Wis.;" in the same line, before the word "daughter," insert the word "helpless."

In line 6 strike out the word "private" and insert in lieu thereof the word "of."

In line 7 strike out the word "Volunteers;" and in the same line, before the word "Infantry," insert the word "Volunteer."

In line 8, after the word "pension," insert the words "at the rate."

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to say anything about the pending bill at this time. I desire to have read, in my time, a letter I received a few days ago, and a short newspaper article upon the subject of pensions.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read in the gentleman's time.

The Clerk read as follows:

PITTSBURG, March 10, 1900.

DEAR SIR: I beg to inclose clipping from the Pittsburg Dispatch—newspaper of largest circulation in western Pennsylvania, and which I believe to correctly represent intelligent public opinion in this State on the question referred to.

The general pension laws are liberal enough in all conscience, and the majority of the private bills are believed to be for benefit of those who have no just claim.

Yours, truly,

A. S. M. MORGAN.

Hon. Mr. TALBERT,
House of Representatives.

AN INSTRUCTIVE SELF-EXPOSURE.

The quarrel between Representative MAHON, of this State, and TALBERT, of South Carolina, is a unique illustration of the political idea of constitutional government and legislative representation. The South Carolinian has been making himself obnoxious for demanding a quorum when special pension bills are passed. This has angered Representative MAHON to such a pitch that he denounces TALBERT on the floor of the House, and expresses the hope that in the next Congress there may be a contest of TALBERT'S seat, and that he (MAHON) may "help to throw him out of the House."

The Constitution of the United States prescribes a majority of the House as "a quorum to do business," and limits the power of less than a quorum to "adjourn from day to day," and "to compel the attendance of absent members." In other words, Mr. TALBERT'S offense is in insisting that the money of the country shall not be spent except by the methods which the Constitution requires. The first aspect of Mr. MAHON'S wrath is that it is because he is prevented from getting special pension bills passed in violation of the Constitution, which he has sworn to maintain and uphold.

But Mr. MAHON is not satisfied with that success at self-classification. He declares that if anyone will help to set up a contest against TALBERT in the next Congress he will help to throw the obnoxious Carolinian out of the House. The little question as to what the vote of the people who are supposed to elect their Representatives may be does not at all concern Mr. MAHON. Because Mr. TALBERT has been guilty of using his right as a member to demand that business shall be done in a constitutional manner Mr. MAHON will vote to unseat him.

It would be difficult for anyone to characterize MAHON more signally than MAHON has characterized himself.

Mr. TALBERT. I desire to have another short letter read, showing the sentiment in the North in regard to my being "thrown out." It is a short letter, and I do not ask to have it read for the purpose of killing time, but to show the sentiment in the North.

Mr. PAYNE. I would like to ask the gentleman if that will entirely clear up his record, so that we can go on with the business of the House a little?

Mr. TALBERT. I did not catch what the gentleman said.

Mr. PAYNE. I want to inquire if that will entirely clear up the record of the gentleman from South Carolina, so that the House can proceed with its business?

Mr. TALBERT. "The gentleman's record" is perfectly clear; but I wanted to take care of the Republicans, for fear they will be lost, and to satisfy my friend from Ohio; but I do not think I can save them.

Mr. PAYNE. I do not know but what I ought to object if that is the theory.

Mr. GROSVENOR. When I want a savior, I will make my own selection. [Laughter.]

Mr. TALBERT. I will not reply, as I did not catch what the gentleman said. I ask that the letter be read, because the gentleman is joined to his idols.

The Clerk read as follows:

BUCYRUS PUBLIC SCHOOLS, March 24, 1900.

KIND SIR: May you live long——

[Laughter.]

and enjoy a happy life; and we of the North hope your people in South Carolina will return you to Congress, for such a noble man as you certainly deserves great praise—— for performing your duty so faithfully at the Capitol of the United States for the people.

"A government of the people, for the people, by the people."—A. L.

Very respectfully,

HIRAM K. SMITH,
231 North Sandusky avenue, Bucyrus, Ohio.

Hon. W. JASPER TALBERT,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. TALBERT. Now, Mr. Chairman, so much for that. These speak for themselves. [Laughter.] I wish to say a few Fridays ago we had what is known as private-claim day, to consider bills from the Committee on Claims. Well, I believe during that day there were six or seven claims passed. The reports were read on every occasion. The bills were discussed, which ought to have been done: they were criticised and scrutinized, and six of them were passed. I suppose it was right and they ought to have passed. The next Friday was the day for the consideration of bills from the Committee on War Claims, of which my distinguished friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON] is chairman. I believe there were three or four bills, if I am not mistaken, passed through at that time. They were cussed and discussed all day long, and the reports were read.

Now, the point I want to make is that I think, in consideration of claims from the Committees on Pensions, the reports accompanying the bill in every case ought to be read, so that the House can vote intelligently upon the claims at issue. I do not believe that these bills ought to be poured like corn into a hopper and run through without any consideration, without any criticism, and without any scrutiny. I shall therefore ask in every case that the report accompanying the bill be read. I hope the report accompanying the bill which has just been reported will be read in the hearing of the House. I ask for the reading of the report.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the report.

The report (by Mr. MINOR) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1737) to grant a pension to Cora I. Cromwell, submit the following report:

George F. Cromwell, the soldier named in this bill, served as a private in Company I, Thirty-first Regiment Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, from February 18, 1864, to March 19, 1865, when he was wounded in action, and died of such wounds in hospital at Goldsboro, N. C., on March 23, 1865.

His widow, who married him January 5, 1860, was pensioned at $8 per month from the time of the soldier's death to the date of her remarriage, on September 16, 1866, and in 1870 the three minor children of the soldier, of whom the beneficiary named in the bill was one, were also pensioned from the date of the remarriage of their mother to January 27, 1880, when the youngest child became 16 years of age, and pension ceased by operation of law.

Cora I., the beneficiary named in this bill, was born October 15, 1860, and she applied for continuance of her pension under the act of June 27, 1890, by reason of helplessness, and filed proof showing that in 1884 her left arm was amputated because of cancer of the wrist joint; that in 1891 she was operated upon again for a disease peculiar to females; that since that time she has suffered from disease of the kidneys, confined to the bed quite often, and unable to perform any labor whatever.

A medical examination of the beneficiary made July 15, 1899, under the claim named above, disclosed amputation of the left arm, 3 inches below the elbow joint, muscles of the right arm soft and flabby, catarrh of bladder, with bloody urine, and prolapsus of rectum; and the examining surgeon then stated that he did not consider her able to earn her own living.

Her claim, however, was rejected by the Pension Bureau October 28, 1899, upon the ground that she had not been helpless at and prior to the time when she became 16 years of age, hence the act of June 27, 1890, could not apply.

There has been filed with your committee the sworn statement of the beneficiary, to the effect that she first became physically unable to earn a living in 1884 by a swelling in the wrist of her left arm; that amputation of the arm became necessary in October, 1884; that shortly thereafter she had inflammation of the bladder and female troubles, which afflicted her ever since; that in September, 1891, she had to submit to an operation to remove the ovaries; that in 1897 she was operated upon for femoral hernia, and again later on; that by reason of her physical debility and suffering she is unable to earn her living; that her mother is again a widow and unable to maintain or support her; that for the last fifteen years she has been principally supported and maintained by friends.

Medical testimony has also been filed fully corroborating the claimant's statements as to the operations performed and as to her present physical condition, and the same is fully set forth in the affidavit of Dr. G. D. Ladd, which reads as follows:

To whom it may concern:

I hereby certify that Miss Cora I. Cromwell, of Berlin, Wis., has been a patient of mine and under my care, at times, since May, 1897, and until the present time. I operated upon her for ventral hernia on May 12, 1897, and she remained at the hospital and under my immediate care until May 30, 1897. She also at that time suffered from chronic inflammation of the bladder and a tumor (papilloma) of the bladder.

On the 19th day of October, 1897, she returned to the hospital in this city and remained under my care for treatment of inflammation and tumor of the bladder until December 23, 1897. She was in very poor health, and suffered very severely from the disease mentioned, and the ventral hernia (rupture) had returned. She returned to the hospital at frequent intervals for treatment until on June 1, 1899, I again operated for adhesions within the abdomen and for hernia.

Since the last operation she has been, at intervals, in the hospital for treatment for disease of the bladder and general ill health, until October, 25, 1899. She has been in the hospital and under my care, in all, fifteen different times since May, 1897. From my knowledge of her physical condition I find that she is so wholly broken down as to be unable to do any work, either now or in the future.

MILWAUKEE, WIS., February 9, 1900.

EASTERN DISTRICT OF WISCONSIN, ss:

Personally appeared before me George D. Ladd, M. D., who, being by me duly sworn, deposes and says that the foregoing affidavit, subscribed by him, is true to the best of his knowledge and belief.

[SEAL.] EDWARD KURTZ,
Clerk United States District Court, Eastern District of Wisconsin.

The Hon. Mr. DAVIDSON, a member of this House, has filed a statement showing that, to his personal knowledge, the beneficiary is without means of support, having no property of any kind, and no one being legally bound to support her, and that she is practically entirely helpless.

As no one is now drawing any pension on account of the services and death of this soldier, your committee believes that relief by Congress is fully warranted for this helpless daughter of the soldier; and the passage of the bill is recommended after the same shall have been amended as follows:

After the word "roll," in line 4, insert the words "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

In line 5 strike out the words "of Green Lake County, Wis.;" in the same line, before the word "daughter," insert the word "helpless."

In line 6 strike out the word "private" and insert in lieu thereof the word "of."

In line 7 strike out the word "Volunteers;" and in the same line, before the word "Infantry," insert the word "Volunteer."

In line 8, after the word "pension," insert the words "at the rate."

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill granting a pension to Cora I. Cromwell."

During the reading of the above report

Mr. TALBERT said: I ask that the further reading of the report be dispensed with.

I want to call the attention of the House and committee to the fact that in this case the committee have been honest, as they have been in all these cases, in saying in the report that the claimant has no pensionable status at the Pension Bureau, and that after she had received a pension up to the age of 16 years, as I understood, she became afflicted. Now, on account of affliction that has overtaken her ten years after she had received a pension up to 16 years of age, the committee have, on account of her general poverty, reported that she ought to receive a pension. Now, that is the condition. If this House is willing to give a pension to people who are utterly outside of the pale of the pension law because they are poor, why they can continue to do it; but it seems to me that all the States and all the counties have almshouses and poorhouses that are able to take care of people of this class. You will find poor people all over the country.

Now, in most of these cases which I have looked over I think that the committee is honest enough to state that the applicants are not entitled to a pension under any laws, liberal as they are. I only wanted to call the attention of the House to this fact.

Mr. SULLOWAY. This girl was not entitled to a pension because she was not destitute and helpless the moment she became 16 years of age. She did become helpless, absolutely so, unable to do anything for herself, a short time after she became 16; and the committee recommended the pension. The gentleman from South Carolina talks about there being no law for it. If she was entitled to a pension under existing law, we should not bring this bill here. This is a good case, a deserving case, and the bill ought to pass.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

ELIJAH BIDDLE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1801) granting a pension to Elijah Biddle.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Elijah Biddle, late a private in Company E, Second Regiment Ohio Volunteer Heavy Artillery, and pay him a pension of $50 a month in lieu of the pension he is now receiving.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I have here a letter which I received a few days ago, and although it has no direct bearing on this bill, it has upon bills of a similar kind. It is from a gentleman in Maine, and I desire to have it read in my time.

NORTH BRADFORD, ME., March 31, 1900.

DEAR SIR: I see by the papers that Congress last Friday passed 142 private pension bills. Now I and thousands of other old soldiers protest against this wholesale private pension business. Any coffee cooler or bummer, who has a political pull or can get up a big petition can get a big pension, while others, ever so worthy, have to take whatever the Pension Bureau gives them.

I believe that that is where all claims should be settled and that Congressmen should find other business to attend to but tumbling over each other in passing claims, many of which are fraudulent.

I see that George M. Brown, of Bangor, Me., has been voted a pension of $40 a month. Now I do not doubt but what Brown was a good soldier, but why should he be entitled to more than any other soldier who is rated the same? It is claimed that he is poor, yet he has a house worth $1,200 and some money in the bank.

Now, Mr. Congressman, I served in the Union Army four years. I enlisted in April of 1861 and was discharged in September of 1865. I carried a musket three years and then was commissioned. I was wounded three times and have been a physical wreck for the last thirty years. I have ever been treated fair by the Government and have no fault to find with the Pension Department. I have a medal of honor that I received from Congress, but I am not as lucky as Major Brown. My house is not worth $1,200, neither have I any bank stock. From the effect of my wounds and heart trouble, I can do no work or business.

There is a man living in an adjoining town that was with me in the First Maine Heavy Artillery, who came home as sound and well as when he went to war, and continued so till a few years ago, when he got hurt by a vicious horse which he was handling for a neighbor. He has been getting $30 a month; has a good property and money to let when he can get 10 per cent interest. He was not satisfied with what he was getting, but by a special act he got it increased to fifty.

Now, I think this Congressional pension bureau is all wrong, and the old boys are sore over the way pensions are ground out.

Please excuse me for thus addressing you, but I saw that you did not believe in the grab business, and thought I would write you how we old fellows feel about it.

Truly, yours, A. J. KNOWLES,
Late Captain, Company D, First Maine Heavy Artillery, North Bradford, Me.

Hon. Mr. TALBERT.

Mr. SIMS. Are not these two cases ones in which I moved to amend?

Mr. TALBERT. These letters are samples of hundreds that I have home in my desk. I do not propose to bring forward any more of them to have read and take up the time of the committee. I only put these forward as samples. I want to emphasize this point, that it seems to me the committee does not scrutinize as closely as they ought the statements of these applicants as to their property and means of support. Here is this man, the owner of bank stock and a house worth $1,200. Now, I ask for the reading of the report in this case. This is almost similar to the one referred to in the letter. I ask for the reading of the report. This bill seeks to raise this man's pension from $12 to $30. It may be that he has more property than the man referred to in the letter that has just been read, and only shows what I am contending for—that unjust claims are being allowed by the committee.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1801) granting a pension to Elijah Biddle, submit the following report:

This soldier, who is now 57 years of age, served as a private in Company E, Thirty-seventh Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, from June 2, 1862, to October 3, 1862, when mustered out with his company, and enlisted again as a private in Company E, Second Regiment Ohio Heavy Artillery, July 1, 1863; was taken prisoner of war at Sweetwater, Tenn., February 16, 1865; paroled April 2, 1865, and mustered out on detachment muster-out roll on June 14, 1865. He is now a pensioner under the act of June 27, 1890, at $12 per month for total inability to earn a support by manual labor by reason of impaired sight, which pension was allowed in lieu of one under the general law of $4 per month formerly granted to him on account of chronic diarrhea of service origin.

In the claim under the general law filed June 23, 1890, in which chronic diarrhea was set up as a disabling cause of service origin, the soldier also claimed pension on account of a severe injury to his left side, fracturing the collar bone and two ribs, alleged to have been received near Fort Boyle, Ky., about April 1, 1864, by his horse falling while on detached service as drillmaster at said fort, and in July, 1890, he claimed on account of another disability, namely, loss of sight.

These claims were rejected January 12, 1894, upon the ground of no record and no proof of origin in line of duty, and claimant's declared inability to furnish such proof.

The claimant alleged that he was left at Fort Boyle with one George F. Race, as drillmasters; that the garrison consisted of a colored company; that he did not know any of the officers, and that he was treated for the injuries by a private physician, Dr. Young, who lived near the fort, and that he was unable to find or locate his comrade, Race, who was present when he was injured.

A comrade of the soldier, who testified to the origin of diarrhea, stated to a special examiner of the Bureau that when the company left Fort Boyle the beneficiary and Race were left behind; that shortly thereafter some of the boys in the company got a letter from Race stating that the claimant had been thrown from a mule, and thereby broke his collar bone and two ribs; and the claimant filed proof that while at home on furlough after having been paroled, he suffered from said injuries, and continued so to suffer since his discharge.

He admitted his inability to file any proof as to the origin of his eye trouble, and stated that while his eyes were somewhat affected before the service the disease steadily increased as a result of his army service.

Medical examinations beginning in 1882 found fracture of the left clavicle, for which the surgeons rated him $4, but no fracture of ribs; and the last certificate of medical examination, made on August 18, 1897, rated him $12 for rheumatism; nothing for diarrhea; $4 for the fracture, and $30 for impaired sight due to extreme myopia, and the surgeons then stated that the soldier was just able to get about with the aid of a powerful double concave lens.

Medical testimony filed with your committee shows that the claimant is now suffering from myopia to such an extent as to be almost completely blind; that by reason of this and general debility, due to an attack of pneumonia and various other sicknesses, he is unable to do any work whatever; that with double concave glasses at 3 feet he could recognize a man as an object only, but could not see irregularities in the ground, and that at 60 feet he could not see anything.

The circumstances under which the special examiner of the Pension Bureau obtained the information as to the receipt of the fracture by the beneficiary leads this committee to believe that full faith and credit should be given to such statement; and there is also no doubt in the minds of your committee that the preexisting myopia was aggravated by exposures in the service; and inasmuch as the beneficiary is now practically blind, a pension of $30 per month seems to be fully warranted under the circumstances; and hence the passage of the bill is recommended after the same shall have been amended as follows:

In line 6 strike out the word "a;" in the same line strike out the word "in."

In line 8, before the word "of," insert the words "at the rate."

Strike out the word "fifty," in line 8, and insert in lieu thereof the word "thirty."

In line 8 strike out the words "the pension" and insert in lieu thereof the word "that."

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to Elijah Biddle."

Mr. TALBERT. Now, Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee if he has any affidavit as to the pecuniary or financial condition of this applicant?

Mr. SULLOWAY. This man is now 57 years old, is totally unable to support himself by labor by reason of the impaired sight, and the special examiner reported that his statements were entitled to the utmost credit.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

MARGARET BURNS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3655) granting a pension to Mrs. Margaret Burns, as widow of Peter Burns, late of Company F, Twenty-third Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, in the war of the rebellion.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Margaret Burns, as widow of Peter Burns, late of Company F, Twenty-third Regiment of Illinois Infantry Volunteers, in the war of the rebellion.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the reading of the report.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3655) granting a pension to Mrs. Margaret Burns, as widow of Peter Burns, late of Company F, Twenty-third Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, in the war of the rebellion, submit the following report:

Peter Burns, the soldier named in this bill, served as a private in Company F, Twenty-third Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, from April 23, 1861, to October 8, 1861, when discharged by reason of having been a paroled prisoner of war.

He never applied for pension under any law granting pensions to soldiers.

Margaret Burns, the beneficiary named in this bill, and now 75 years of age, applied for pension as the widow of the soldier under the act of June 27, 1890, alleging that her husband died in 1876, leaving her as his widow, and that she is without other means of support than her daily labor.

This claim was specially examined, and was rejected June 8, 1893, and March 9, 1894, after such special examination, upon the ground that the presumption of soldier's death was not warranted by the facts elicited on such special examination; and this rejection was affirmed by Assistant Secretary Reynolds under date of September 6, 1894, in the following language:

"* * * The appellant and the soldier were married in England in 1849, and had eight children, but two of which are now living. After their emigration to this country he was in employment as a coal miner, and in following his vocation frequently left her, seeking work in other places. He does not appear to have had any permanent residence at any time, leaving with no expressed intention as to his destination or his return, rarely or never communicating with appellant during his absence, and generally returning to her only when she was able otherwise to learn his whereabouts and requested him to do so or went to him instead. She followed him up in this manner many times and during many years throughout Virginia, Kentucky, Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois. While they were at Springfield, Ill., he enlisted in the Army, unknown to her, in April, 1861, and was discharged in October of the same year; but she did not learn his whereabouts or see him again until about the close of the war, when he came to her at Cincinnati, Ohio, stayed two days, and then returned to his work in the coal mines of Virginia.

"He left her finally 'on St. Patrick's day,' in 1874, while they were living in Bowersville, Ill., since which time she has not seen or heard from him nor of him except once through her son, who (as he testifies herein) was told about 1880 by an old friend of his father that he had heard of his death near Des Moines, Iowa, where he was working in a coal mine, but he stated no particulars further, as the train he was leaving on started and stopped the conversation; that this friend's address he did not know, and he being then an old man, said son believes him to be now deceased. This evidence as to the fact of death, however, is too uncertain, indefinite, and remote to be relied upon to any extent.

"After the soldier last left appellant as aforesaid, she removed about July 1, 1874, to Danville, Ill., where she remained about a year, and then went to New Burnside, Ill., where she lived with her daughter until she came to Murphysboro, Ill., her present home, in 1892.

"The soldier never applied for pension. Appellant testifies he was somewhat but not excessively addicted to drink. Another witness testifies he drank considerably, and when in this condition was quarrelsome and abusive. If now living, he would be about 64 years of age.

"It is considered by the Department that the facts shown do not raise a legal presumption of the soldier's death, as they reasonably account otherwise for his absence. The action is therefore affirmed."

Subsequent to such rejection the beneficiary invoked the provisions of the act of March 13, 1896; but the claim was again rejected by the Pension Bureau, August 30, 1897, upon the ground that the presumption of death could not obtain under said act of March 13, 1896; and this action was again affirmed by the Assistant Secretary of the Interior, Webster Davis, under date of January 30, 1899, no new evidence or additional facts having been filed or submitted as to the soldier's leaving his home and the claimant, or tending in any way to show his death, since the departmental decision of September 6, 1894, in the case.

Proof has been filed in the Pension Bureau to the effect that the claimant has not remarried since her husband left her last in 1874; that she has no property of any kind; that she is quite old and feeble, unable to make a living, and dependent upon the charity of friends.

In view of the fact that twenty-six years have elapsed since the soldier was last seen or heard from, the soldier having never applied for pension, either under the general law or under the act of June 27, 1890, under which last-named law he undoubtedly would have title by reason of age alone, your committee are of the opinion that the death of the soldier should be presumed, and that the beneficiary should be granted the relief sought for in the bill, and the passage of the same is recommended after it shall have been amended as follows:

In line 6 strike out the word "as" before the word "widow."

In line 7 strike out the work "of" before the word "Illinois." In the same line strike out the word "Volunteer;" and in the same line, before the word "Infantry," insert the word "Volunteer."

In line 8 strike out the words "in the war of the rebellion" and insert in lieu thereof the words "and pay her a pension at the rate of $8 per month, such pension, however, to cease upon proof that the soldier is still living."

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill granting a pension to Margaret Burns."

Mr. TALBERT. Now, Mr. Chairman, here is a claim to pension a woman who says she has no husband, but there is no evidence that she is a widow. Notwithstanding what the committee says in the report, here is an applicant for a pension on the ground that she is a widow, and no evidence has been adduced showing that she is really a widow. I submit that we ought not to pass such a claim as this, and I therefore move that this bill be laid aside with the recommendation that it do lie on the table.

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the statement made by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TALBERT] is warranted by the facts. This woman was married to her husband in 1849, in England, and in 1874, on St. Patrick's Day, at Bowersville, Ill., he left her. The only reason that the evidence was not considered sufficient before the Bureau and on appeal was because the evidence did not follow the usual common-law requirement that he left her under such circumstances as would not be explainable, but adopted the theory that he might return. The rule in cases at common law is, when applied to the evidence, that the circumstances must show that he was not likely to return if living. That is the only phase of this proof that is absolutely not made complete. Nothing has been heard of the soldier since 1874, and they were married in 1849.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Is the soldier getting a pension?

Mr. SULLOWAY. No.

Mr. TALBERT. There is no positive evidence adduced that he is dead or that she is a widow. She is claiming a pension as a widow when nobody knows whether she is a widow or not.

Mr. BARTLETT. I understand it to be a rule of the Pension Bureau that in these cases they do not recognize the common-law rule that prevails in all States in the Union, that an absence of seven years unaccounted for raises a prima facie presumption that the man is dead. Now, the Pension Bureau refuses to recognize that rule, I understand; do they not?

Mr. GRAFF. I think the Bureau does recognize that principle of evidence.

Mr. BARTLETT. No; I know of a case in my own city of a widow absolutely helpless, without any money, and the pension was refused merely upon that ground. The attention of the Office was called to the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States my myself to the fact that this husband has been absent fourteen years, but because she could not demonstrate absolutely that he was dead by some one who actually saw him dead or saw him die she was refused and had to do without a pension.

Mr. GRAFF. That may be true.

Mr. BARTLETT. I do not think the ruling of the department is correct. And if the effect of this bill is simply to pension a widow whose husband has been absent and unaccounted for during the length of time that appears in this case, I think we ought to pass the bill. I think the Pension Bureau ought in cases of this kind to follow the rule which is recognized at common law and also by the Supreme Court of the United States and by statutes and decisions in the several States. It seems to me that a widow whose husband is shown by ordinary testimony to have been absent for so great a number of years and unaccounted for should not be compelled to resort to this House in order to get a pension.

I did not rise for the purpose of opposing the gentleman's bill. From all that I understand, it is a meritorious bill and ought to pass; but I believe that the Pension Bureau ought not to compel widows who are in the position in which this widow appears to be to resort to the aid of Congressmen in order to get a private pension bill through here, when the Pension Bureau, if it would follow the well-known and accepted rules of law, would grant a pension and save Congress from the necessity of such private legislation.

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Speaker, I will say in reply to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] that, as I understand, the Bureau recognizes the common-law rule on this subject. Under that rule, as gentlemen here are aware, one of the elements necessary to be shown——

Mr. BARTLETT. The Pension Bureau ought to be bound by the rule which the Supreme Court of the United States has recognized.

Mr. GRAFF. As I was about to say, one element of proof necessary under the common-law rule is that the absence shall be unexplainable. This is the point where claimants usually fall down and fail to make satisfactory proof. In this case, however, it seems to me that the long absence of the husband, and the fact that one of the sons testifies that he heard of the death of his father in 1880, and the further fact that this man and woman were married in 1849 and lived together until 1874, would tend to show that the failure of the husband to return to his wife during this lapse of years raises a strong presumption of his death.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Why is the fact of the apparent abandonment of the wife unexplainable?

Mr. GRAFF. Well, the fact that the husband had left his wife on several occasions, and that he was addicted to drink, left room for the Pension Bureau to say that it had not been shown that his absence was unexplainable and could not be accounted for on any other theory than that he was dead. That was the point in this case—simply a technical point. I think the bill ought to pass.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, for the benefit of the House I wish to say that I am perfectly familiar with this case. Mrs. Burns is a resident of my home town. She is an old lady, 75 years of age. The facts of the case are fully shown in the report. She made application for a pension under the act of June, 1890, and since I have been in Congress I have personally looked after her case. I went to the Department, I had the evidence all examined, and I made a personal statement of the condition of the claimant and her standing in the community; but the claim was rejected. Of course she has never been able to prove absolutely that her husband is dead. If she were able to do that she would be entitled to a pension under the act of June, 1890. But her husband has been absent over twenty-six years and unheard of during all that time.

There were born to this lady during the time she and her husband lived together eight children. She has struggled along as best she could to support those children and to raise such of them as are now living. She and her husband lived together from 1849 up to the time he left her, twenty-six years ago. He was a miner and at different times left home to seek work, not abandoning his wife at all, but, as the evidence shows, and as was shown to the Department, for the purpose of finding work as a miner at different places. When thus seeking work he would be gone for a time and his wife would not hear from him, but he would return. They would go from place to place as his employment called him. Finally, twenty-six years ago, he left again, and from that time to this has never been heard from.

I know from my personal knowledge that this old lady has made every effort that was possible to learn the whereabouts of her husband or whether he was dead. She has advertised time and again in the St. Louis papers and other papers. She has inquired by letter and otherwise of every person that she thought would have any knowledge whatever of her husband.

Mr. GRAFF. Is it not true—it seems to me it is, according to my recollection of the case—that the special examiner, in reporting to the Bureau the result of his examination of this case in the field, stated that in his opinion this soldier was dead?

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Yes, sir; that was the statement of the special examiner as his opinion on the examination.

Now, the fact remains, Mr. Chairman, that at no time has this soldier ever applied for a pension. Considering that he would be now, if living, about 75 years of age, we naturally presume that if living he would have applied for a pension at some time during the last twenty-six years. And I consider that fact alone as very strong evidence of the death of the soldier many years ago.

Mr. GAINES. The presumption of law would be that he died long since. Any court of equity would so hold under the circumstances.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Yes, undoubtedly; but the Pension Office fails to recognize the presumption of law which is manifest in the case, and in this instance has manifestly indulged in splitting hairs, as is frequently done by that Bureau, and no remedy is left but by special bill.

This, Mr. Chairman, is as meritorious a case as has ever been presented to this body. It is as meritorious as any case that can possibly be brought before Congress under the circumstances.

Mr. GAINES. Is this an original pension?

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Yes, sir.

Mr. GAINES. How much do you ask?

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. The committee recommend $8 a month, the amount she would be entitled to under the act of June, 1890, if she could prove that her husband was actually dead.

Mr. GAINES. And this soldier served in the civil war?

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Yes, sir.

I ask a vote.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, the statements which have just been made show precisely what I have been driving at. All I desire is to get some explanation of these bills. Now I am satisfied with the statements made, and withdraw the motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion of the gentleman from South Carolina having been withdrawn, the question will be taken on the amendments reported from the committee.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

SIMON PRICE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1943) granting an increase of pension to Simon Price.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Simon Price, late a private in Company B, Second Iowa Volunteer Cavalry, and pay him a pension of $30 per month in lieu of the pension he is now receiving.

The following amendments, recommended by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, were read:

In line 6 strike out the word "a;" in the same line strike out the word "in;" in the same line, before the word "Iowa," insert the word "Regiment."

In line 7, after the word "pension," insert the words "at the rate;" in the same line strike out the word "thirty" and insert in lieu thereof the word "twenty."

In line 8 strike out the words "the pension" and insert in lieu thereof the word "that."

Mr. TALBERT. I ask that the report be read.

The report (by Mr. GRAFF) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1943) granting an increase of pension to Simon Price, submit the following report:

A similar bill was favorably reported upon by your committee in the Fifty-fourth Congress, and the report of that committee, herewith, gives the facts in the case.

The soldier has filed no claim for increase of pension in the Pension Bureau since 1888, nor has he ever sought relief under the act of June 27, 1890.

There has been filed with your committee the sworn statement of the soldier to the effect that he is a great sufferer from rheumatism, affecting especially his right arm and left leg; that his rheumatic trouble is growing worse from year to year, until now he is so physically disabled as to make it impossible to do any work requiring the constant use of his limbs; and that as a result of scurvy contracted in the service he has lost all of his teeth.

He also filed medical testimony, showing that upon a medical examination of the soldier on February 26, 1900, rheumatism affecting the left hip joint and right elbow and all of the joints of the right hand was found; also the loss of all but four teeth, as the result of scurvy, and ulceration of the gums and tongue, and considerable impairment of speech, and inflammation of the conjunctivæ; also the statement of the county treasurer of Yankton County, S. Dak., to the effect that the soldier has no property belonging to him in that county or in the State; also the testimony of a neighbor of the soldier to the effect that, to his personal knowledge, the soldier has not been able to perform manual labor, except of the lightest kind, for the last ten years.

Mr. TALBERT. I hope the gentleman in charge of this measure will make some statement in regard to it, as the report is not, in my judgment, a satisfactory one and does not cover all of the points.

Mr. GAMBLE. I will state in regard to this bill that this soldier is personally well known to me and resides in my own town. He is a man with a splendid record in the Army, having served in Colonel HEPBURN'S regiment from Iowa. I know the facts stated in the report to be true of my own personal knowledge. By reason of scurvy he lost his teeth, nearly all of them, and is a great sufferer from rheumatism, affecting him to such an extent and growing worse from year to year, that he is physically disabled and is unable to do any work requiring constant use of his limbs. His health is impaired to such an extent that he is unfitted for almost any kind of labor. In addition to that the claimant is a very poor man, and the statement certified to, as the report will show.

In addition to that, Mr. Chairman, in the Fifty-fourth Congress the same bill was introduced and a favorable and unanimous report was made at $30 per month upon the facts then presented to the committee. It was, however, so late in the session that no opportunity was offered to consider the bill. In the Fifty-fifth Congress it was introduced and passed the Senate at $20 per month.

As it is disclosed here, I repeat, the evidence shows that this man is helpless, and during the past year, by fire, he has practically lost all he possessed.

I submit, sir, in view of the facts as certified to in the report, and from my own knowledge, this is a highly meritorious case and ought to be passed.

Mr. TALBERT. I have no doubt that every word the gentleman says is true, and in the report we find that the committee put all the facts before the House; they do not try to cover anything; but I do not discover in the report that his disability can be traced to service origin—that is to say, that the disability can not be traced, as the law requires, to service origin—and yet the committee authorize the increase.

Mr. SIMS. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee a question to see if I understood him correctly in his statement. Has there been any application for increase of pension at the Bureau?

Mr. GAMBLE. There was, and it was rejected in 1895. In 1896 a special bill was introduced in the Fifty-fourth Congress for his relief.

Mr. SIMS. I understood the report to say that he had made no application for increase since 1888.

Mr. GAMBLE. But that was pending until 1895, and was not rejected until that time.

Mr. SIMS. On what ground was it rejected?

Mr. GAMBLE. I do not know that I can state.

Mr. SIMS. Do not the records here show?

Mr. GAMBLE. I do not know that the record states that. I am not so familiar with the history of the case in the Pension Office that I can answer the question of the gentleman.

Mr. SIMS. The committee, in the last session, made it a rule that the applicant must have made an application and that application have been rejected.

Mr. GAMBLE. That is true in this case, and it was pending from 1888 until 1895.

Mr. SIMS. Is there no ground stated for the cause of rejection?

Mr. GAMBLE. Yes; it stated that they failed to prove clearly that the disability was of service origin, on account of the death of some of his comrades.

Mr. SIMS. It was rejected because the disability was not shown to be of service origin?

Mr. GAMBLE. Not clearly. It was shown, but not as clearly as the Pension Office thought it should be.

Mr. SIMS. What is his present pension?

Mr. GAMBLE. Ten dollars a month.

Mr. SIMS. And what increase is asked for?

Mr. GAMBLE. An increase to $20.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

CELIA A. JEFFERS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 1251) granting an increase of pension to Celia A. Jeffers.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Celia A. Jeffers, widow of Aaron Jeffers, late of Company F, Nineteenth Regiment Michigan Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

Mr. TALBERT. I should like to have the gentleman who introduced the bill give us some light upon it, unless the report is read.

Mr. SULLOWAY. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NEVILLE].

Mr. NEVILLE. This is a Senate bill, which passed the Senate and came over here, so it was not introduced by a member of this House. I introduced a similar bill in the House, but as this passed the Senate first I thought it was better to let the House bill go and have the Senate bill pass, so as to save time.

This widow lives at Bassett, in Rock County, in my district. Her husband served nearly four years, serving from August, 1862, until June, 1865. He was taken prisoner at Thompsons Station, Tenn., March 5, 1863, and confined at Richmond, March 22, 1863, being paroled at City Point, Va., March 31, 1863.

He reported at College Green Barracks April 1, 1863, and was sent to Camp Parole, Maryland, April 3, 1863, where he arrived the same day. He was sent to Camp Chase, Ohio, April 6, 1863, where he reported for duty, and was present there May 7, 1863. The company reports show him as follows: June 9, 1863, left in hospital, Louisville, Ky.; July 24, 1863, returned from hospital. He died February 27, 1880, and the widow filed her declaration for a widow's pension March 1, 1887, which was granted March 22, 1889, carrying a rate of $8 per month from February 27, 1880, the date of the death of the soldier above referred to, and $12 per month from March 19, 1886, with $2 additional for minor child, who was 16 March 6, 1891.

This young man, Charles C. Jeffers, on the 16th day of September, 1891, while driving the city dray, fell forward from the load, falling directly behind the mules, receiving a kick on his head which caused a fracture and heavy depression of his skull about 3 inches above his left eye. From this there resulted a permanent injury which made the young man an absolute invalid and a charge upon his widowed mother, which he has been for years.

The bill was unanimously reported by the Senate committee, and, as I understand, unanimously reported by the House committee. I know that it is a worthy case and I hope there will be no objection to it.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I see by the reading of the report here that the father of the applicant here——

Mr. NEVILLE. The husband of the applicant.

Mr. TALBERT. The one for whom the pension is claimed received no disability in the service; but the report says:

On the 16th day of September, 1891, while driving the city dray, the said Charles C. Jeffers fell forward from the load, falling directly behind the mules, receiving a kick on his head, which caused a fracture and heavy depression of his skull, about 3 inches above his left eye.

Now, does this House propose to grant pensions upon such flimsy excuses as that? It does seem to me that this is an unworthy case, with due deference to what the gentleman has said. I know that his statements are facts, but the granting of this pension would be in direct violation of all law and all right and all justice.

It may be a small matter, but a great many of these small matters put together will make a very large matter. Now, why continue to do that? Do we propose to pension the wife and children of every man who falls off a wagon and gets his head hurt, or anything of that kind? Is there not provision made in the poorhouses for cases of this kind? If this Congress is going to pension all the poor people of this country, it will have a tremendous burden upon its hands. I submit that this is an unjust and unmeritorious claim, and ought not to pass.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Chairman, it would seem to be almost impossible to conceive a more meritorious case than this. The gentleman has not stated a single reason, he has not stated, so far as I could hear, a single fact in regard to it. What are the facts? This widow has a helpless child, the son of a soldier; and the fact is that if he had received his disability that made him as helpless as an infant six months and ten days earlier than he did, he would have been allowed a pension under the general law, and he would not have come here, as his mother comes here, asking this Government, for him whose father served his country, to contribute the difference between her pension as a widow and what this bill gives her to take care of this helpless son of that old soldier; and if there is a man in this House or in this country who begrudges taking that from the Treasury, God pity him; I can not.

Mr. TALBERT. I want to say, in reply to the gentleman, that I have no doubt that the statements that he has made are true. But are you going to give pensions to all those people who may have fallen off a load of wood and injured themselves? Do you propose to go ahead and pension out of the public Treasury every man's widow, if he died poor in this country? If you do, I think you will have on your hands a tremendous burden. I want to say, while you talk about pity, we should pity the taxpayers of this country a little as we are dispensing pity in this country. There seems to be an inordinate greed on the part of members to run their hands into the public Treasury. There seems to me to be a general system of logrolling in this House, where men get together and see if they can not pass each other's claims; and I say that the time has come when we should call a halt in the extravagant pension appropriations, and stop long enough to recollect that somebody has got to pay this money that you are appropriating here so lavishly. We do not stop long enough to recollect that the taxpayers as well as the tax consumers of this country deserve consideration at the hands of the lawmakers of this great nation.

Mr. NEVILLE. I think the gentleman misunderstands the situation here. The husband of this widow, who is the applicant here, enlisted at Schoolcraft, Mich., and the son, Charles C. Jeffers, is the son of a soldier and of the widow who here applies. The soldier himself is dead, and the son of this soldier is absolutely dependent upon the mercy and generosity of the people of the United States. I say that it is time that the people of this country should be willing to grant every old soldier who bared his breast to the bullets of the people who endeavored to deprive the country of its stability and its Union a pension; and I hope there will be no objection to pensioning any old soldier's widow, whether she has a son dependent upon her or not, if she is dependent upon the cold charity of this country for her livelihood. But when that dependence is doubled by the unfortunate circumstances which made the son of this soldier an invalid there ought not to be a man who has a spark of American blood in his veins that would for a moment seek to deprive the widow and the son, through the widow, of the benefits of a pension when the soldier was as deserving as any other old soldier; and I hope there will be no objection to this bill.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

MARY A. RUSSELL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 3375) granting a pension to Mary A. Russell.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary A. Russell, helpless and dependent daughter of Herbert C. Russell, of Company C, Sixty-eighth Regiment of Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

Mr. TALBERT. I ask for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2375) granting a pension to Mary A. Russell, have examined the same and adopt the Senate report thereon, and recommend that the bill do pass.

[Senate Report No. 235, Fifty-sixth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2375) granting a pension to Mary A. Russell, have duly considered the same and submit the following report:

Herbert C. Russell, the father of the claimant, was a soldier in Company C, Sixty-eighth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, enrolled January 3 and mustered into the service January 23, 1864, and was honorably discharged June 10, 1865, and while in the service was sick in hospitals at Mound City, Ill., and Camp Denison, Ohio, and died December 5, 1876, leaving two daughters, Lurr, aged 5 years and 6 months, and the claimant, Mary A., aged 3 years and 6 months, and a widow, Cora, who died July 16, 1881.

The claimant applied for a pension in 1896, which was rejected on the ground that the records of the War Department did not show the incurrence of the fatal disease of her father in the service. The evidence clearly shows that the claimant was from infancy a nervous, sickly child, who, at about the age of 12 years, was afflicted with neurasthenia, which has steadily grown worse, and for the past seven years she has been entirely helpless and bedridden, unable to sit up, requiring constant attention. Claimant is permanently helpless and was left utterly dependent, and is so now. No one is pensioned on account of her father. Her case is meritorious and exceptional, and your committee report back the bill with a recommendation for its passage.

Mr. TALBERT. Now, Mr. Chairman, here is a report of the committee, as in all the other reports, showing that a claim was filed for a pension in 1896, which was rejected on the ground that the records of the War Department did not show the incurrence of the fatal disease of her father in the service. I only want to bring this fact to the attention of the country and the public, that in nearly every case here it is admitted that the claimant does not really deserve a pension, and can not get it under the law, and yet as an appeal court here we must take them here and grant them a pension.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

ALLEN BUCKNER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 320) granting an increase of pension to Allen Buckner.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Allen Buckner, late colonel Seventy-ninth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the reading of the report.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Will not the gentleman allow me to make a statement?

Mr. TALBERT. Certainly. All I want is a statement of the facts, so that we shall not be at work here blindfolded.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. I will try and take the blindfold down. This soldier had a service of three years and one month. He was wounded and left on the battlefield, and laid over night without attention. He was finally discharged and granted a pension at first of $22.50, and finally $30; and at the last examination in 1892 the medical examination shows that for service origin he was entitled to $45, but there was no pensionable standing between $30 and $50, so he was turned down on that account. Now, the officer in charge, the brigadier general, says, "I do not remember ever having seen a braver and more gallant man than Mr. Buckner. We could always find him if we sought the post of danger," etc.

Mr. GAINES. How much is his pension now?

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. He is now pensioned at $30.

Mr. TALBERT. Now drawing $30 a month?

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Yes, $30. One eye out and the other barely able to see, hobbling along for thirty-odd years, blind, wounded, but entitled to a pension by service origin for $45, and the committee thought it would give him $50.

Mr. TALBERT. What is his pecuniary condition?

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Poor as a church mouse.

Mr. TALBERT. How poor is that? [Laughter.] The reason I ask is that very statement was made here at the last Congress in regard to the pension of General Palmer, who, it was afterwards said, was worth $50,000 or $75,000. I would like to know how poor a church mouse is. I have seen church mice tolerably fat. [Laughter.]

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. It is easy to take the time of the House with such talk as this; but that is past and gone. Now let us give this old soldier what he deserves.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

FREDERICK HIGGINS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 2209) granting an increase of pension to Frederick Higgins.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Frederick Higgins, late of Company G, Thirty-first Regiment Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $25 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

Mr. TALBERT. I ask for the reading of the report, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. If the gentleman will allow me, I will make a statement in this case. Here is an old soldier three years in service, old and poor. The examining surgeon states that the claimant has a double scrotal hernia not retained by truss, tumors at least 7 inches in diameter, for which they rate $17 a month.

He has other disabilities, and the committee thought this old soldier ought to have $25.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I want to put in the RECORD another statement from the report. It appears from the report that he made a claim under the general law of September 25, 1884, alleging that at Bentonville, N. C., in March, 1865, while on a retreat from the line of skirmishing, in attempting to jump a ditch, he missed his footing and fell into the ditch, causing a rupture of his side. He fell into a ditch and now he is here claiming a pension.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. I could say something that would sound as well as that, but I will forbear and let it go.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

DAVID HUNTER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 645) granting an increase of pension to David Hunter.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of David Hunter, late first lieutenant and adjutant, Thirty-fifth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Here is a case of a soldier 56 years old. He received an injury by a horse falling on him while in the service. He was discharged and came home, and the official examination shows that his physical condition was the result of this accident.

Official examinations were made of his physical condition at various times, with the following result: In February, 1867, his mind was reported weak; his voice hesitating; in September, 1873, "hearing of left ear impaired and sense of smell gone. The head is affected by heat of sun. He probably suffered severe concussion of brain, from effects of which he has not fully recovered." In September, 1875: "The man's manner and conversation indicate that his mental powers have been and are still impaired." September, 1877: "Still suffers from the consequences of concussion of the brain, brought on by a fall from his horse; has lost the hearing of left ear and the sense of smell; is subject to headache and dizziness after physical or mental excitement." There is also sufficient evidence on file to prove that the claimant is a sufferer from epileptic fits.

Mr. GAINES. Was he ever pensioned before?

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. He is now pensioned at the rate of $17. This is the Senate report. The bill passed the Senate in the Fifty-fourth Congress, it was reported favorably in the Fifty-fifth Congress, and it has passed the Senate in the Fifty-sixth Congress, and they say that the old soldier ought to have $30 a month.

Mr. TALBERT. Why could not he get an increase at the Pension Bureau?

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Because they say that his condition shows only $17 pensionable service origin. This great American Congress is called upon to bring relief to an old soldier whose body has been enfeebled, whose mind was weakened, whose eyes are practically out, and who can not perform any manual labor whatever. They say that only $17 of it is attributable to his service. If I had my way, I would give him $50 instead of $30. I think the Senate bill is a fair one, and it ought to pass.

Mr. TALBERT. What do you think the taxpayers would say about it?

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. If there is a taxpayer in America who, after seeing this old soldier and taking into consideration the fact that in order to maintain the flag of the Union he gave not only three years of his life but sacrificed his eyesight and his health and even his mind—if there is a single taxpayer not willing to pay his portion of the taxes to pay a pension in this case, then, in the language of the chairman of the committee, I say, "God pity that taxpayer!" [Applause.]

Mr. PAYNE. How old is this man?

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Fifty-seven.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the taxpayers know very well that these bills are for increasing the pensions of those who are already drawing a sufficient amount of pension to keep them out of the poorhouse, which they ought to have. But these increases are asked for upon the top of these liberal pensions that they are already drawing. Why do not the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MIERS] and the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. SULLOWAY] bring in here claims for pensions to old soldiers who have never had a cent of pension? Why are not such bills put ahead of these claims for increase of pension? It seems to me that if gentlemen want to prove their friendship for the old soldier—gentlemen who talk about "pitying the taxpayer"—I ask, why do you not give pensions to some of these old soldiers who are unable or unwilling to swear to what is not true, and who have no political "pull?" Why not give pensions to such men? Why not give them a little of that Government aid of which they have had not a bit? Why not do this instead of increasing the pensions of those who have enough to keep them out of the poorhouse?

The question being taken, the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

ELENDER HERRING.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 1265) granting a pension to Elender Herring.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Elender Herring, dependent mother of George W. Herring, late of Company I, Sixty-second Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. If the gentleman from South Carolina desires information about this case, I will make a statement of it. This is the claim of a dependent mother. She had a marriage ceremony with the father of this soldier in 1837. It seems that there is some question as to whether she had been properly divorced from her former husband—her first husband. The Pension Department holds that there is some question about the legality of her marriage. But the marriage ceremony was performed between her and this man in 1837, and she lived with him in good faith. The soldier in this case was the legitimate offspring of that marriage. She is now 75 years of age. The Pension Bureau did not recognize her as having any pensionable standing, because, as I have said, a question was raised as to the legality of her marriage. That is all there is in this case.

[Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, here is a case of an original pension, as I understand—not a claim for an increase.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. The gentleman said a moment ago, Why do you not bring in here bills for original pensions—not applications for increase. We now have before us such a case as the gentleman asked for.

Mr. TALBERT. This is not an application for an increase of pension?

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. No, sir.

Mr. TALBERT. There is some sense in that.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Thank you.

Mr. TALBERT. For God's sake, let us take up some of these applications for original pensions in preference to the cases of those who already have pension enough to get along with.

The question being taken, the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

JOHN B. RITZMAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 1194) granting an increase of pension to John B. Ritzman.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc. That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John B. Ritzman, late of Company F, Fifth Regiment Iowa Volunteer Cavalry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $16 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

Mr. TALBERT. I ask for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. HEDGE) was read, as follows:

[Senate Report No. 267, Fifty-sixth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1194) granting a pension to John B. Ritzman, have examined the same and report:

A similar bill was introduced in the Senate in the Fifty-fifth Congress, favorably reported, and passed the Senate.

The report was as follows:

"The War Department records show that claimant was enrolled in Company F, Fifth Iowa Cavalry, on the 16th of September, 1861, and was mustered out October 25, 1864. There is no record of treatment for any disability while in the service.

"He filed an application for pension May 28, 1883, on account of rheumatism and results of salivation. On February 23, 1888, he alleged sunstroke. These claims were ajudicated in October, 1889, and he was allowed $4 per month from May 28, 1883, and $8 from May 4, 1887, for rheumatism and resulting disease of mouth following salivation. Sunstroke was rejected because of no record and inability of claimant, after special examination, to furnish any evidence showing incurrence in line of duty.

"November 30, 1889, he applied for increase and for resulting erysipelas. This claim was allowed, and his pension increased to $12 per month from June 18, 1890, for same disability. Application for increase for deafness and erysipelas was rejected May 21, 1894, because of no increase of pensioned disability. Erysipelas was rejected legally, because of no record and claimant's apparent inability to connect the same with service. Deafness was rejected by the medical referee because of no disability since filing.

"Efforts have been made by the claimant to have the claim for deafness allowed, but without success. An examination was made by a specialist April 15, 1895, and upon the receipt of his report the medical referee said:

"'Neither the evidence nor the certificates of examination filed since rejection of claim show the existence of a pensionable degree of disability therefrom.'

"March 19, 1896, another examination was made by a specialist, who reports as follows:

"'The membrane tympanum normal, except in lower anterior margin, where it is opaque and thickened. There is a small, round depression in this opaque space that looks like a hole into the middle ear, but I am unable to poke the smallest probe through the membrane. Ordinary voice sounds are distinguished at 6 feet, but not heard distinctly at 10 feet. The left ear is normal in every respect, and hears ordinary conversation readily at 20 feet. There is no disease of the post nares or throat or eustachian tubes of either ear.'

"The medical referee, in a slip dated September 28, 1897, says:

"'The evidence referred to in your slip of September 22, 1897, is not sufficient to warrant the granting of another medical examination with a view to reopening the claim on account of deafness of right ear, for the reason that said evidence can not be accepted as controverting the adverse report of experts who have examined this claimant.'

"The evidence filed by the claimant tends to show that he is about three-fourths deaf in right ear. This disability has been legally established in the Pension Office, and it would seem that there is some disability from deafness, but not enough to warrant an increase to $24, as provided by the bill.

"Your committee recommend the passage of the bill."

Your committee adopt the foregoing report and recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, it appears from this report that the increase asked for here was not granted at the Pension Bureau because the disability was not of service origin. Bearing on that question I desire to send to the desk and have read an editorial which appeared a few days ago in the Washington Post in regard to the position of a Representative in this House upon this question of special pensions.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I dislike to see the RECORD filled with matter which appears to be all on one side of these cases. Let me say that I have in my desk more letters of condemnation in regard to those who oppose these pension bills than the gentleman possibly can have letters of commendation. I prefer, however, not to fill the RECORD with matter of that kind. I do not know but there may be in this case no other course open to me than to "fight fire with fire." I should very much dislike to object to the reading of anything which any gentleman desires to have read.

Mr. TALBERT. I have no objection whatever to the gentleman printing in the RECORD what he pleases; but I now ask for the reading of the editorial in my own time.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. I must object.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. GROSVENOR). Does this relate to the pending bill?

Mr. TALBERT. It relates to the general subject of pensions.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hold, then, that it is not in order, except by unanimous consent. [Applause.]

Mr. TALBERT. Then, Mr. Chairman, I take the floor in my own right and demand my right to read this myself.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, that would be another question, for future determination.

Mr. TALBERT (continuing). I do not propose to be overruled by any Chairman in the exercise of my right as a Representative on this floor.

Mr. FORDNEY. If the gentleman chooses to read it I, will object to its going into the RECORD.

Mr. TALBERT. I will read the article myself.

REPRESENTATIVE LOUD ON SPECIAL PENSIONS.

On Friday last the House of Representatives passed 97 pension bills, special acts——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina is not in order.

Mr. TALBERT. Does the Chair decide that I am out of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does.

Mr. TALBERT. In reading this article?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that the gentleman is out of order.

Mr. TALBERT. Then I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to prevail.

Mr. TALBERT demanded a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 52, noes 8.

Before the announcement of the vote,

Mr. TALBERT. I make the point that no quorum is present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman had better wait until the result of the vote has been announced.

Mr. TALBERT. Oh, well, Mr. Chairman, I will be early enough.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. TALBERT. I make the point of order that no quorum is present. Now overrule that, will you? [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN (having counted the committee). One hundred and sixteen members are present; a quorum is present, the ayes have it, and the decision of the Chair is sustained.

The question is on laying the bill aside with a favorable recommendation.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

CASPER MILLER, JR.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 994) granting an increase of pension to Casper Miller, jr.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Casper Miller, jr., late first lieutentant Company E, Eighty-second Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $17 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

Mr. TALBERT. I ask for the reading of the report in that case.

The report (by Mr. GASTON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 994) granting an increase of pension to Casper Miller, jr., have examined the same and adopt the Senate report thereon, and recommend that the bill do pass.

[Senate Report No. 224, Fifty-sixth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 994) granting an increase of pension to Casper Miller, jr., have examined the same and report:

This bill proposes to increase the pension of Casper Miller, jr., late first lieutenant Company E, Eighty-second Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, from $12 to $17 per month.

Casper Miller, jr., enlisted in Company F, Twenty-third Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, August 2, 1861; reenlisted as a veteran volunteer December 26, 1863; was promoted to second lieutenant August 27, 1864; promoted to first lieutenant Company E, Eighty-second Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, April 14, 1865, and was discharged July 13, 1865. He was wounded in head in action at Cold Harbor, Va., June 2, 1864. Hospital records show him treated in June, 1864, for wound of scalp.

He first made claim for pension under the general law December 31, 1885, alleging that while a sergeant he received gunshot wound right side of head in action at Cold Harbor, Va., June 1, 1864. On October 21, 1886, he was allowed a pension for this wound at the rate of $2 per month. This pension was increased to $4 per month October 9, 1889, and to $8 per month August 13, 1890.

On July 9, 1890, he filed a claim under the act of June 27, 1890, and on May 6, 1892, he was allowed a pension under this law at the rate of $12 per month, which is the pension he now receives.

Examining surgeons, May 8, 1891, report:

"Claimant 51 years of age, 5 feet 9 inches high, and weighs 185 pounds; gunshot wound of head located over right occipito-parietal suture, cicatrix is linear in shape, 1 inch by one-eighth inch, not tender, dragging, or adherent, no loss of tissue or fracture of outer table; slight prominence of skull at that point, slight enlargement about size of pea; neuralgic pains radiate from seat of injury; right peripheral nerve is doubtless injured, as considerable pain is induced upon pressure upon the scar; neuralgic pains all over posterior and outer surface of right side of head; rate, $6; chronic granular pharyngitis, with elongation of uvula, laryngitis with loss of voice; has not spoken, except in a loud whisper, for three years; rate, $6.

"Two internal piles, each the size of a bean, engorgement of internal veins, but no ulceration, prolapsus, or bleeding; rate, $4. Thickening of both spermatic cords, result of hydrocele, which operated upon two years ago on the right side of scrotum, whole scrotal structures are enlarged, being now in the absence of fluid 8 inches in circumference, spermatic cords are three times their normal size; rate, $4. Rheumatism, crepitation in both shoulders, both knees, and hips, but no swelling, inflammation, etc.; lumbago well marked; rate, $4. Claimant is one-half disqualified for the performance of manual labor."

Your committee believe that the neuralgic pains over the greater part of his head from which this claimant suffers are due to the gunshot wound received in battle, and this, with his other disabilities, entitle him to a higher rate of pension than he now receives. His service was long and honorable, and the passage of the bill is recommended.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

BENJAMIN F. BOURNE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 819) granting an increase of pension to Benjamin F. Bourne.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Benjamin F. Bourne, late of Company F, Twenty-seventh Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $20 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

Mr. TALBERT. I ask for the reading of the report in that case.

Mr. GRAFF. Would the gentleman from South Carolina be satisfied with a brief explanation?

Mr. TALBERT. Certainly; that would be entirely satisfactory to me.

Mr. SIBLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the reading be dispensed with.

Mr. GRAFF. I have asked consent to make a short explanation for the special benefit of the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. SIBLEY. Very well; I did not know that the gentleman had taken the floor.

Mr. GRAFF. This soldier, Mr. Chairman, served over three years in the war of the rebellion and was honorably discharged at the end of the war. He is pensioned under the act of June 27, 1890, at the rate of $12 per month, which means, practically, that he is totally disabled for the performance of manual labor.

The bill seeks only to increase the pension to $20 per month. He had a claim under the general law in the Bureau, but it was rejected for the reason that part of the disability was incurred while he was on detached service, and also while a prisoner of war at Lynchburg, Va., and hence was not able to prove, technically, the incurrence of the disease as the result of his Army service.

Mr. TALBERT. Has he any means for his support?

Mr. GRAFF. None whatever.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the bill will be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

RHODA A. FOSTER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 239) granting an increase of pension to Rhoda A. Foster.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll the name of Rhoda A.

Foster, widow of Albert H. Foster, late captain of Company D, Twenty-fifth Regiment Massachusetts Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

Mr. TALBERT. I ask for the reading of the report.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks for the reading of the report. Is there objection to the reading of this report?

Mr. SHATTUC. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made.

Mr. TALBERT. I move that the report be read.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. TALBERT, on a division, demanded by Mr. TALBERT, there were—ayes 7, noes 45.

Mr. TALBERT. I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the suggestion, because there is a quorum present, within the knowledge of the Chair.

Mr. TALBERT. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has just counted the House and there are more than a hundred members present.

Mr. GRAFF. I submit that the gentleman's point is dilatory.

Mr. TALBERT. I should like to know how the gentleman knows whether it is dilatory or not.

The CHAIRMAN. The present occupant of the chair would hold that a suggestion of no quorum could always be made, even though it was intended, as in the present case, to be dilatory, but in the present case the Chair takes knowledge of the fact that there is a quorum present and overrules the suggestion. The question is upon the motion that this bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

ANNIE B. GOODRICH.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1419) granting an increase of pension to Annie B. Goodrich.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Annie B. Goodrich, widow of Amos B. Goodrich, late second lieutenant of Company A, Twentieth Massachusetts Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $15 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the report be read.

Mr. SIBLEY. I move that the reading of the report be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from South Carolina make a motion that the report be read?

Mr. TALBERT. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina, as the Chair understands it, can ask that this report be read in his time, he having now taken the floor upon this bill; but if objection is made to the reading of the report, it is a question for the House to say whether it shall be read or not.

Mr. TALBERT. I understood the Chairman to put the motion a while ago.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina made the motion himself, upon objection being made.

Mr. TALBERT. And the Chairman put the motion. I submit that the Chair is sometimes fair; but I want to say——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from South Carolina now move that the report be read?

Mr. TALBERT. I do.

Mr. SIBLEY. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina moves that this report be read.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. TALBERT) there were—ayes 1, noes 55.

Mr. TALBERT. I make the point again, Mr. Chairman, that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point.

Mr. TALBERT. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that that is made for the purpose of delay.

Mr. TALBERT. I desire to say a few words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. TALBERT. I am surprised, indeed, at this very drastic and arbitrary proceeding, revolutionary——

A MEMBER. Unconstitutional.

Mr. TALBERT. The gentleman down there says unconstitutional.

Mr. NEVILLE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TALBERT. Why, certainly, always, my friend.

Mr. NEVILLE. Will you tell this House why you do not make this point of no quorum when other business than pensions to the old soldiers is being considered? [Applause.]

Mr. TALBERT. I will say to the gentleman that I make my own statements, and I state why I do a thing when it suits me, and when it does not suit me I do not do it; but let me say to the gentleman that if he will sit down and be easy and let his hair grow, I will tell him why I do it.

Mr. NEVILLE. Is it not true that at the same time you do this you claim that you are in favor of pensions to the old soldiers?

Mr. TALBERT. To an honest, patriotic old fellow who followed the flag from first to last, I am. But I am absolutely opposed to giving pensions to bummers, deserters, and coffee coolers, and all that sort of thing, and I am opposed to these infernal increases to men and women that already have a competency, whilst the old soldiers are left out without original pensions. The gentleman asks me why I am here in opposition to pension legislation? I will tell the gentleman why. It is because no other member out of 356 will do it, and I believe it ought to be done; and believing that it ought to be done, and believing that I am right, is why I, singly and alone, have stood up here and had criticisms harsh and extreme put upon my head for doing what I believe to be right.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. TALBERT. Why, certainly.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Now, this bill is to increase the pension of an old woman who was only drawing $8. She is blind and 75 years old, and it only proposes to give her $15.

Mr. TALBERT. I have no doubt about that.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Let it pass.

Mr. TALBERT. I have no doubt that if she had half a dozen eyes the gentleman would still want to pension her. I am not responsible for this delay. The House saw how the thing was going on. They had a gentleman in the chair that would not undertake to be arbitrary, and they hunted up the present occupant of the chair and put him there to decide what he has decided. [Hisses.] I say that with all due respect to my friend, who looks so much like Santa Claus that I like him, because he pleases the children. [Laughter.]

I deny it most emphatically. I am trying to treat them all alike, God knows; but I am opposed to men who are rich, who are millionaires, getting pensions. I am opposed to men in high office drawing pensions. There are numbers of these men in your Departments, with salaries from $1,000 to $2,000 a year, drawing pensions. I am opposed to members of Congress upon the floor of this House drawing a pension and also a salary of $5,000 a year; but I am not opposed to proper pensions to the old soldiers.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order. A few days ago the Chairman, when the House was in Committee of the Whole, made a ruling in the debate that a matter could not be read without the consent of the House.

Mr. TALBERT. I can read the report in my time.

Mr. SIBLEY. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. TALBERT. Certainly.

Mr. SIBLEY. Now, I have no doubt about the gentleman's sincerity—that he in his own mind believes he is defending the interests of the taxpayers of this country. I give him credit for sincerity, and I want to ask him to stop and think. Let him take his pencil and a bit of paper and figure up. For this House to be in session it costs something like $15,000 a day. Now, if the gentleman will make a little mathemathical calculation he will find——

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman allow me right there?

Mr. SIBLEY. Certainly.

Mr. HEPBURN. Take the days that we are in session one year with another, and he will find that it costs the Treasury $37,000 a day or $7,500 an hour in a day of five hours.

Mr. SIBLEY. Seventy-five hundred dollars an hour. My friend from South Carolina will admit that in the last few years he has used months' of the time of this House in opposing legislation the cost of the time for which would have paid every pension bill that has been before the House this session. [Great applause.]

Mr. TALBERT. I want to say to the gentleman that he is entirely mistaken. I have prevented the passage of a hundred or more than I have favored. [Derisive applause on the Republican side.]

Ah, gentlemen, I have heard it thunder before. I have seen the lightning flash, and there are not Republicans enough to scare this boy. [Laughter.] But I want to say in reply to my friend yonder that he gets out of one place and into another so often that I can not follow him. [Laughter.] I want to say, gentlemen, that I stand by the faith of the fathers.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to read the report, if the Clerk will furnish me with it, in my own time.

Mr. TALBERT began reading the report.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will say to the gentleman from South Carolina that the House has voted that that report should not be read.

Mr. TALBERT. I did not think, Mr. Chairman, there had been any vote on this report.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. GROSVENOR). This was the report. I hope the gentleman from South Carolina, unless he has some point to make about the report, will allow the business to go on. If the gentleman wishes to hear the rule, the Chair will read it:

It is equally an error to suppose that any member has a right, without a question put, to lay a book or paper on the table and have it read on suggesting that it contains matter infringing on the privileges of the House.

Mr. TALBERT. Well, Mr. Chairman, we will have the next bill read. [Laughter.]

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

FRANKLIN C. PLANTZ.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 2167) granting an increase of pension to Franklin C. Plantz.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Franklin C. Plantz, late corporal, Company C, Fifty-first Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $16 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

ROBERT BLACK.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 62) granting an increase of pension to Robert Black.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Robert Black, late a private in Company C of the Eighth Regiment of New York Volunteer Heavy Artillery, and pay him a pension of $24 per month in lieu of the pension he is now receiving.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the report be read.

Mr. SIBLEY. I object, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. TALBERT. I desire to make a few remarks on this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question before the committee is whether or not the report shall be read. Does the gentleman withdraw his request for the reading of the report?

Mr. TALBERT. No, Mr. Chairman; I submit that I shall be compelled to read the report, or a portion of it, in discussing the bill before the House. I hope this House has not arrived at that understanding or at that point where they want to stifle free speech, where they want to gag anybody, especially my distinguished, smooth-faced chameleon from Pennsylvania [laughter], coquetting, with silver and gold, with the facile ease of an agile acrobat. [Great laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina will confine himself to the bill before the committee.

Mr. TALBERT. Confine himself to the subject in hand. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair accepts the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. TALBERT. "The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred this bill granting an increase of pension to Franklin C. Plantz, examined the same and reports." That is what the report says. Here you are allowing another increase. Nearly every one of these bills are for an increase from the original pension. I make the point against this bill that the claimant is in comfortable circumstances, doing very well, with a pension sufficient to live, while numbers of other old soldiers have not received a single cent. The report further says:

A bill identical in form was introduced in the Senate during the Fifty-fourth Congress, passed the Senate, and was reported favorably to the House.

Mr. Chairman, you know that anything can pass the Senate if it has a special appropriation.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. It is bad enough to read the report of every bill that comes up, without undertaking to read the report of a bill that has already been laid aside.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will call the attention of the gentleman from South Carolina to the fact that he is reading the report of a bill that has already been laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. TALBERT. I am like the old nigger preacher when he was preaching on Jonah and the whale, said he knew there had been swallowing done somewhere.

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. TALBERT. Yes; for a question.

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. I will wait until the gentleman has finished.

Mr. TALBERT. This report says this bill proposes to grant an increase of pension to Robert Black, late a private in Company C, in the Eighth Regiment New York Volunteer Heavy Artillery, from $17 a month to $24 a month. So here it is again, giving an increase to a man who has enough and has all that he is allowed by the liberal pension laws of this great Government, leaving out other deserving old soldiers. Now, Mr. Chairman, I will say no more on this bill.

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. Mr. Chairman—— [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"] If it is necessary, I shall raise a question of personal privilege before a vote shall be taken. I ask the right to address the House in reply to some remarks made by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TALBERT] so unjust that no member of this committee ought to sit silent any longer. Mr. Chairman, while I may be prejudiced in favor of the men that defended the flag, in the years I have been in this House the longest hours have been given to the careful, honest, faithful consideration of these pension measures.

Now, I know that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TALBERT] is a kind-hearted man. I know he is contentious, and, when he meets contention, becomes angry and unreasonable; but he has no right to charge upon this floor as against this committee—I will not speak of myself, but for every other member of the committee, who is just as honest and just as honorable as he is—that we are acting in a manner false to facts, false to right, justice, and honor.

Mr. TALBERT. I hope the gentleman does not think that I charged any dishonesty to the committee.

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. You must charge dishonesty when you say that we are pensioning millionaires and unworthy, dishonest, and perjured applicants.

Mr. TALBERT. I did not say any such thing. I did not charge that upon the committee.

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. The gentleman's statement is certainly in the RECORD that we are "adding to the pensions of those who have already enough and more and who are living in ease and luxury." I deny it, and I hurl that back. I say to you that no pension ever reported on this floor by the committee to which I belong—not one—but what has had the most careful consideration by a committee at least as honest and conscientious as any other committee in this House; and I say to the gentleman if it is your desire and ambition to continue to fight the idea of pensions you ought to see that it must be futile now. You ought to know that on your side and in every State of this great country there is not a voice raised against the men who fought against you except your own.

In the name of God and humanity, what pride can a man have in feeling within himself that he is supreme over all the members of this House, Democrats and Republicans alike? [Applause.] Will it bring you a higher glory, a higher fame? Will it add to your honor? Will it make your own people love you better to stand here hour by hour and fritter away the time of the House and the time of the people asserting your judgment in opposition to that of every other man on this floor and holding that yours is supreme over all?

I beg you, in the spirit of kindness—in that spirit of love that I have learned to have for you—to desist. When you can come on this floor and assert in honor and in integrity of purpose that a particular claim is an unjust claim, and when you can prove your assertion, I will stand by you and vote against it. [Applause.] But the mere cry "Read the report," the mere cry "I raise a point of order," the mere cry "There is no quorum" does not prove sincerity, but only an absolute determination to delay doing justice to the men who in their old age are going down to their graves in penury.

I would be glad if I could arouse you to a higher patriotism, to take care of the men of your own State who were at Appomattox and Stone River and Gettysburg, and I would say that you would be cowardly if on this floor you did not take care of them when you had the opportunity. But when you come here and undertake to deny that right to these men, charging perjury and fraud, we on our side have something to complain of. The soldier has something to complain of against you and me. We have made it hard enough, God knows, for the soldier and his widow and his orphans to secure justice. The Pension Department and Congress itself have raised barriers enough against my old comrades without having the aid of South Carolina to, by its unreasoning Representative on this floor, assassinate justice, kill patriotism, and deny equity to the men who saved the nation. It is not necessary longer to keep up this unseemly and absolute senseless performance in this House. I offer you my hand in kindness. I say nothing detrimental to your honesty; but I beg of you to use your judgment and your reason, to stand forth as a man and earn the approbation of all men on this floor by doing justice and legislating along the lines of common decency and common sense. [Loud applause.]

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I will say, in reply to what the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NORTON] has said, that so far as concerns charging the committee with dishonesty or anything of that sort, nothing was further from my thought. I stated that the committee had been honest and that when they brought in a report here it showed that the claimant had been to the Pension Bureau and that his application had been denied.

I want to say to the gentleman that when he twits me with being the only man on this floor who is opposed to fraudulent pensions, I accept the distinction; I feel that I am honored if I am the only man on the Democratic or the Republican side who has the manhood to rise up here and vote against fraudulent pensions. When the gentleman says that I have undertaken to stop the pension of a single deserving old soldier, he misstates the fact.

I appeal to every gentleman on this side and on the other side; they will bear me out in the statement that since I have been a member of this House I have never voted against a pension when I thought that the soldier honestly deserved it. I want to say to the gentleman that I expect to persist in this course, and the Democratic party can do as it pleases. For one I do not wish to go to the public Treasury to get money to electioneer with by getting money out of pensioners who have received pensions that they do not deserve.

I believe that the pension laws of this nation are sufficiently liberal to give every old soldier who deserves it a pension; but I do say that you are rushing through here in this House numbers of claims that are unjust, that have no merit in them, and that the Grand Army posts themselves are passing resolutions against this wholesale passage of pension bills.

Mr. NEVILLE. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. TALBERT. Certainly.

Mr. NEVILLE. If you say as a matter of fact that we are rushing through a great many pensions which are unjust and fraudulent, how could you, a few moments ago, say that you were not making a charge of dishonesty against the members of the Pension Committee?

Mr. TALBERT. I will answer the gentleman with pleasure by saying this: The Committee on Invalid Pensions is composed of gentlemen of high patriotism.

That is exactly the case, Mr. Chairman; but we know that they are human beings after all, and members on this side of the House and members on that go to them and appeal to them and ask them to help this poor old man or poor old woman in order to get their pensions, or get an increase of pension, when they know, and must know, that these people are not entitled to the pension, and ought not to have it, and yet in the goodness of their hearts, with the desire to help those who are poor and impoverished, they go before the committee and appeal, and therefore get the bills through that ought not to pass, as they themselves must admit, if they will examine the records in the case. That is all I meant to say. I never have made any assault on that committee. I have made no charge against them on the score of dishonesty; but, as I say, they are simply human beings and subject to the appeals of their fellow-members, and, like all other men, are liable to error.

Mr. GASTON. Will the gentleman allow an interruption just there?

Mr. TALBERT. Certainly.

Mr. GASTON. As a member of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, I wish to say that the statement of the gentleman that appeals are made to members on that committee by the members on this floor is not true. We do not meet with members at all in that way. The gentleman is mistaken altogether in assuming that the committee hears the appeals of members for the passage of this, that, or the other bill.

Mr. TALBERT. Well, I did not yield to the gentleman for a speech.

Mr. GASTON. That is all I desired to say. Simply that the gentleman is in error as to his statement.

Mr. TALBERT (continuing). But, Mr. Chairman, when a gentleman rises on this floor and undertakes to lecture me for my course here, I want to say to him, sir, that I have adopted my position with reference to this matter after mature deliberation and careful consideration. I want him to understand that my position here has been taken after that consideration and deliberation and study, and that I stand by every word that I have ever said and every position that I have ever taken since I have been a member of this body with reference to pension legislation or anything else.

And I will say to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NORTON], who undertook to lecture me, that I feel as friendly to all the old soldiers as the gentleman does, or any other member on this floor, and would be just as ready to raise my voice or my arm in behalf of any old soldier, whether he wore the blue or the gray, as the gentleman himself would be. But all of this criticism that has been showered down upon my head because I dared to stand here and oppose what I regard to be an injustice to the taxpayers of this country has no effect upon me and can not induce me to change my position.

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. TALBERT (continuing). And I hope the Chair will allow me to have read the protest of the veterans as bearing upon this very question, which I send to the desk.

Mr. LAMB. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. TALBERT. Yes, sir.

Mr. LAMB. I want to know what good you hope to accomplish by all of this delay in the business of the House?

Mr. TALBERT. Oh, well, Mr. Chairman, I have no little petty claims to beg anybody for, or to ask any assistance to secure their passage. You are sitting there, and this man is sitting here, with these little petty claims that you are anxious to get through, and you will vote for almost anything in order to get that little, infernal claim of your own through. [Laughter.] I am citing what I regard to be the justice and the merits of the position itself, and not because I have any favors to ask of anybody. This whole thing looks like a mere matter of "log rolling," each member voting to help the other, and all of them ready to use the taxing power of the Government in order to put pension claims through Congress, many of which, as I have said, I do not believe to be meritorious or have any warrant in law. I am absolutely opposed to it.

Mr. LAMB. I want to ask my friend from South Carolina another question. Do you mean that you have no "petty claims" here yourself, and that therefore you have no sympathy for your fellow-colleagues who have such claims?

Mr. TALBERT. If they are true and honest I should favor their payment. I am not dealing in war claims myself. When I went into the Confederate army with my people we went in with the understanding that we would take the consequences, whatever they might be, and I am not here as a beggar for anything at the hands of the Government. I do not intend to do this now or in the future. Other gentlemen may come to beg and ask favors at the hands of the Government. I will not. I shall oppose these measures whenever they come before the House and whenever I have an opportunity of presenting my opposition to them, unless I believe them to be absolutely just and founded in right.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. CAPRON). Does the gentleman from Virginia desire to be recognized?

Mr. LAMB. Yes; in my own time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia is recognized.

Mr. LAMB. I want to say to my friend from South Carolina that there are numbers of us in Virginia and the border States who have meritorious claims that ought to be considered by this House; and if the gentleman had not made this dilatory move here and prevented us from having these pension claims considered at night sessions, we should have had two more Fridays in each month for the consideration of those claims. I want to say to my friend that I have been before the Committee on Invalid Pensions and the Committee on Pensions, and I know that they have scrutinized and criticised every bill that has been before them.

I have in my own district numbers of Federal soldiers who moved down there, who are now old and dependent; numbers of soldiers of the Mexican war, and of the Indian wars, for whom I have been unable to get any recommendation from these committees, so particular have they been in this matter, and I want to exonerate this committee, so far as I am concerned, and I want to say now to my friend from South Carolina that I beg him to cease this work here which he is doing and let us carry on business in the proper way.

Mr. TALBERT. I should like to ask the gentleman if his having these private claims here does not prevent him from voting against what he considers to be unjust claims for fear members who are interested in them will fight his own claims?

Mr. LAMB. No, sir; my claims stand on their merits, and I challenge investigation. I was a Confederate soldier, as well as my friend, and am ready to vote for meritorious claims that are reported to this House.

Mr. TALBERT. That is what is the matter. If I have any claim here, I will present it on its merits, and I will not beg to have any little infernal thing paid back that we lost in the war. We staked everything and lost it, and we submit to it and do not whine about it.

Mr. SIBLEY. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. How many times is the gentleman entitled to recognition upon one bill?

The CHAIRMAN. Once. If there be no objection, the bill will be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

PATRICK LAYHEE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 241) granting a pension to Patrick Layhee.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Patrick Layhee, invalid and dependent son of William Layhee, late of Company G, First Regiment Massachusetts Volunteer Heavy Artillery, and pay him a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

ELLEN C. ABBOTT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 1331) granting an increase of pension to Ellen C. Abbott.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the limitations and provisions of the pension laws, the name of Ellen C. Abbott, widow of Joseph C. Abbott, late colonel of the Seventh Regiment New Hampshire Volunteer Infantry, and brevet brigadier-general, United States Volunteers, and pay her a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

WILLIAM F. BOYAKIN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8830) granting an increase of pension to William F. Boyakin.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William F. Boyakin, late chaplain of the Thirtieth Regiment of Illinois Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $72 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The following amendments recommended by the Committee on Invalid Pensions were read:

In line 7 strike out the word "of" before the word "Illinois."

In line 8 strike out the words "seventy-two" and insert in lieu thereof the word "forty."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

CORNELIA DE PEYSTER BLACK.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 209) granting an increase of pension to Cornelia De Peyster Black.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Cornelia De Peyster Black, widow of Henry M. Black, late colonel, United States Army, and pay her a pension at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

JOSEPHINE I. OFFLEY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 208) granting an increase of pension to Josephine I. Offley.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Josephine I. Offley, widow of Robert H. Offley, late colonel of the Tenth United States Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of that which she is now receiving.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

OLIVER J. LYON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 1729) granting an increase of pension to Oliver J. Lyon.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Oliver J. Lyon, late of Company K, Twenty-fifth Regiment Iowa Volunteer Infantry, also of Company G, Forty-fifth Regiment Iowa Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

Mr. TALBERT. I ask that the report in that case be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the report.

The Clerk began the reading of the report.

Mr. SIBLEY. I move that the further reading of the report be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no objection, the further reading of the report will be dispensed with.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

HENRIETTA CUMMINS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 531) granting a pension to Henrietta Cummins.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Henrietta Cummins, widow of Vincent Cummins, late captain of Company H, Seventy-second Regiment Enrolled Missouri Militia, and pay her a pension at the rate of $30 per month.

Mr. TALBERT. I ask for the reading of the report.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection the report will be read.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the bill will be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I object. I will ask that some member of the committee give some explanation of this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The chairman of the committee is called upon for an explanation of the bill now pending.

Mr. SHATTUC. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman from California a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. LOUD. Certainly.

Mr. SHATTUC. Did you observe that as soon as you took the floor Mr. TALBERT went out? [Laughter.]

Mr. TALBERT. The gentleman has not gone out. Why, I thought the gentleman had eyes. He had eyes and saw not; he had nose, but could not smell. [Laughter.]

Mr. LOUD. I have no doubt but what the gentleman fairly represents his constituency, and shows his ability when he asks a question of that character. [Laughter.] It is a laughing matter with him. I will state, gentlemen, why I asked for an explanation of the bill. The Missouri Enrolled Militia, as I understand, are not entitled to a pension under existing law.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Exactly so.

Mr. LOUD. There are many thousands of them, and I want to ask why you make an exception in this case?

Mr. SULLOWAY. This is a Senate bill, and the report states the question thoroughly. This is an old lady 70 years of age. She married the soldier in 1845, and was his wife during the war. She is extremely poor. He died in the service. The Senate passed this bill giving her $20, the rate that her husband would have been entitled to if mustered. It is a fact that he was not mustered, but he did serve.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. From this report——

Mr. CALDERHEAD. If the gentleman will permit me.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. I yield the floor to the gentleman.

Mr. CALDERHEAD. I want to add to what the chairman of the committee has just said.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California yield?

Mr. LOUD. Certainly I yield.

Mr. CALDERHEAD. This man served two hundred and forty-seven days. He was paid for it by the State, and the State was afterwards reimbursed by the United States. He performed the same kind of service, the same kind of duty, that an officer would have performed who was in the volunteer service. That is the whole of it. If there had been a time when the organization had been under the command of a United States officer so that that fact would have appeared of record, then the uniform rule of the Department is to admit that they were within the general law and entitled to the benefits of the general pension laws.

Here was an organization under the command of General Holland, in the center of the State, in the very theater of war, under two different enlistments, one of one hundred and eighty days and the other of forty-seven days. If a general officer of the United States Army had issued orders to the organization as a whole, or they had been paid directly by the United States instead of indirectly, they would have been eligible under the general law. His widow, who was his wife then, is now 70 years old, blind, and poor, and is just as much entitled to recognition as the widow of any other soldier who served. That is apparent from the reading of the Senate report. The testimony which was before the Senate was not exhibited to our committee, and seldom is, unless there is some occasion for calling for it. If the Senate report which is exhibited to our committee sets out facts which would entitle the claimant to relief at the hands of our committee, we accept the Senate report. In this case we have accepted the Senate report, and there is no challenge except the general challenge made by the distinguished gentleman from California and the distinguished gentleman from South Carolina that these are cases, are all cases, in which the claimants are not entitled to pensions——

Mr. LOUD. I would not go into that field.

Mr. CALDERHEAD. Do not come under the general law.

Mr. LOUD. I suggest to the gentleman that he do not go into that field, because I do not care to enter it myself, unless it is forced upon me at the present time.

Mr. CALDERHEAD. I do not care to force it upon the gentleman at the present time, or care to force it upon him at all; and I yield the floor to the gentleman, thanking him for the time he has given me.

Mr. LOUD. I assumed, Mr. Chairman, that I had the right to respectfully address the House. Now, what I want to call attention to is that there are several thousand persons now living——

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I insist upon order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order.

Mr. LOUD (continuing). Who were members of the Missouri Enrolled Militia; and while I believe that Congress has in the past gone to the extreme limit of generosity in according pensions, it never has yet considered it wise to extend the pension laws to those regiments and companies which performed at best a mere nominal service.

It does not appear in the report that this man who rendered the service ever received a pension. The country never saw fit to reward him for all his services to the old flag. Neither have they ever by general law taken in the many thousand others who rendered probably as meritorious service as this man did. Yet you take up a sympathetic case; the woman he says is blind. Unfortunately there are many blind people in the world. Unfortunately there are many people in the world that are poor; but I say that any member of Congress transgresses his oath when by his vote and action he puts his hand into the public Treasury to compensate a person because he is blind and because he is old.

Oh, you can laugh to scorn my friend from South Carolina. I had about made up my mind to not enter this field again, because it can only break by the weight of its own wickedness; and if you are permitted to pass sixty or eighty cases per hour, then that fact alone will so arouse the sentiment of the people of this country that I believe you ultimately may be brought to a realizing sense of the shameful acts of Congress in rushing pension cases through here as no other class of legislation ever was attempted. Why, if a case comes up here to pay for a mule that was stolen or lost during the late war, the report must be read and discussed for an hour. Yet you attempt to laugh to scorn a man who asks for the reading, or the partial reading, of a report upon a case where you must admit that you have gone beyond the point of reason.

Now, let us assume that this woman was entitled to a pension under the law. She would get $8 a month, Mr. Chairman; but, from the fact that her husband had no pensionable status, you give her $20 a month. My attention was drawn to a case that came up this afternoon, which provoked some discussion, where you gave a widow whose husband had been absent twenty years, whose death was presumptive, $8 a month. And yet, if she had been a remarried widow, you would have given her $12 a month. If she had broken the laws of the land, you would have given her $12. Where in any court of justice in the land this woman could have claimed her right, then you give her what the law permits her to have, and gentlemen rise here and refute the charge the gentleman from South Carolina made that the committee is dishonest. No; what he says is true; you are all human, you are all liable to err, the same as other people.

I say to you that your course in reporting cases is not consistent; it can not be successfully claimed as consistent; and later on you will reach that point where you will be confronted with a condition that will be more serious to you and to the country than any that has yet confronted us, when the widow of every officer that was killed in the late unpleasantness will be knocking at our doors for a pension. You can not reconcile them with consistency, as you will no doubt attempt. If you want to be fair to yourselves and honest to the country, do not take Mrs. A here and Mrs. B there, and Mrs. C in another place, because she happens to have a Representative upon the floor of this House who is interested in her to give her a pension of $5, $10, or $50 a month more than the law gives her, for you will find another who is too modest to come here and beg at your doors. Then you will be confronted with a serious problem.

Now, then, coming back to this case. If you think this widow ought to have a pension, her husband never having had a pensionable status, have the manhood and courage to add a few thousand more to the pension rolls and take in all the Missouri Enrolled Militia.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, in response to what the gentleman has said in reference to the consistency of the committee, I want to say a word. He says that we propose to pension this woman because she is 70 years old and nearly blind. No. If the gentleman will go to the records, he will find that this woman was the wife of a captain of the militia over in Missouri, just on the line where the war raged one way and the other. Her husband served two hundred and forty-seven days. The State of Missouri paid the captain as well as the members of the company for the two hundred and forty-seven days' service.

Not only is that true, but the Federal Government reimbursed the State of Missouri and paid it back. Here is this old mother, 70 years old, who gave her husband 247 days for the nation's services. Missouri has paid it, the Government has paid it; but because the Government did not pay it first, pay for his services originally, the Pension Department under the law is not permitted to grant either the old soldier or the widow a pension. Then where shall she go? She must come here.

I grant you that the law is not what it ought to be. I grant you there ought to be a law passed to put that class of widows on the eligible pension list. But Congress has not done it; and if you apply the rule of the gentleman who says that if some mule has been stolen you have got to file your claim, and after filing it have got to wait until it is reported, and then wait day after day for action on the report—if that is to be the rule in this case, what is to become of this old widow, 70 years of age, now on the road to the poorhouse?

Mr. Chairman, there may be some question about some of these bills; but when the case is one where the claimant has no pensionable standing we have no right to say aught against the Pension Department. This lady is the widow, and during the war was the wife, of a captain; and I submit she is entitled to the $15 a month which the Senate bill gives her.

Mr. LOUD. Does the gentleman assume or does the testimony in the case tend to show that this captain died as the result of disability incurred in the service?

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. It does not.

Mr. LOUD. Then would she be entitled to more than $8 a month?

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. She would be entitled to $12 a month, under the pension law, at the Bureau——

Mr. LOUD. I hardly agree with the gentleman.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Here is the case of a widow 70 years of age. I grant that the committee on the floor of the House has not been as liberal as the Senate committee, but when the Senate committee has reported in favor of giving her $15 a month, rather than take the chances, rather than have her put in the catalogue where the gentleman from California would put her, rather than weigh this widow's pains and aches alongside those of some old, crippled mule, we decided that we would recommend the passage of the bill as it came from the Senate. I trust there is patriotism enough, justice enough—yes, money enough in the Treasury—to enable us to rise to the demands of this occasion and put this bill through just as it came from the committee.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

AMOS H. GOODNOW.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 1721) granting an increase of pension to Amos H. Goodnow.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Amos H. Goodnow, late of Company C, Thirtieth Regiment Iowa Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $40 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

Mr. TALBERT. I ask that the report be read.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the report will be read.

The Clerk proceeded to read the following report:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1721) granting an increase of pension to Amos H. Goodnow, have examined the same and adopt the Senate report thereon and recommend that the bill do pass.

[Senate Report No. 269, Fifty-sixth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1721) granting an increase of pension to Amos H. Goodnow, have examined the same and report:

A similar bill was introduced in the Senate during the Fifty-fifth Congress, reported favorably, and passed the Senate.

The report was as follows:

"The records of the War Department show that this soldier was mustered into service as a private in Company C, Thirtieth Iowa Infantry, and that he was wounded in battle. Certificate of disability for discharge, May 24, 1865, reports: 'Wounded in action at battle of Resaca, Ga., resulting in amputation of leg.' The surgeon reports: 'Loss of right leg by amputation at middle third from gunshot wound received at battle of Resaca, Ga., May 13, 1864. Disability, total.'

"He was pensioned at $8 per month from May 24, 1865; increased to $15 from June 6, 1866; to $18 from June 4, 1872; to $24 from March 3, 1883, and to $30 from August 4, 1886.

"August 20, 1890, he applied for increase. The medical referee refused to order an examination, on the ground that the evidence showed that soldier could and did wear an artificial limb. An examination was considered unnecessary, as it would not alter the status of the case.

"After rejection of this claim an appeal was taken to the Secretary of the Interior, who affirmed the action of rejection, holding that it was shown by the evidence that the leg was not totally disabled, and hence he was receiving all the pension to which he was entitled. No effort has been made to secure increase at the Pension Office since rejection in 1891.

"Evidence on file with the committee shows that claimant suffers constant pain in the limb, and that he can not wear the artificial limb furnished by the Government, but uses one of his own make.

"Your committee are of opinion that this is a case where some degree of relief should be accorded by Congress, and accordingly recommend the passage of the bill."

The foregoing report is adopted, and the passage of the bill recommended.

Mr. SIBLEY (before the reading of the report was concluded). I move that the further reading of this report be dispensed with.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, is not this motion debatable? In this case the pension proposed to be paid is $40, and I think we are entitled to know the reasons on which the bill is based.

Mr. SIBLEY. This is a case of the loss of a leg——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the proper course for the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY] would have been to object to the further reading.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. I hope we shall allow this report to be read. While I would not myself ask for the reading of the report, yet the request seems to be practically fair. The report will show the merits of the claim thoroughly.

Mr. SIBLEY. The question is not what the report shows; but if we pass 100 of these pension bills, it will cost the Government $36,000; and the time we are wasting in the reading of these reports is going to cost the Government just as much as or more than the passage of all the pension bills on the Calendar.

Mr. TALBERT. If the reports were not read, would we not still remain here?

Mr. SIBLEY. I do not think we would be here, or we would at any rate get through more quickly with our business.

Mr. TALBERT. The gentleman might not be here, because he hardly ever is here. We do not know where he is. He is like a flea—in politics and everything else.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the report.

The reading of the report was resumed and concluded.

Mr. COWHERD. I would like to put a question either to the chairman of the committee or to some other member. The other day, when calling on the Department in reference to a bill in which Congress had provided by legislation what allowance should be made for certain disabilities, I was informed that a pension of over $17 a month was not allowable under the law unless the disability was equal to the loss of a hand or a foot, in which case the pension would be $24 a month; and that if both hands or both feet were lost the pension would be only $30 a month. Now, as I understand, this applicant has lost one foot, and we propose to make the pension $40. Is not that larger than the law allows for a corresponding injury?

Mr. CALDERHEAD. I do not remember what the testimony in the case was, except in a general way. My recollection is, however, that the testimony shows that this man is entirely enfeebled; that he is worn out by pain from the disabled limb. There is a disability there that is practically total and permanent.

Mr. COWHERD. If the gentleman will allow me to interrupt him at this point and permit me to renew my question I wish to say that my point is this: I suppose, of course, that the committee desires in these special cases to put the party on the same general plane of others who are on the pension roll under the general law and who get their pensions through the Department?

Mr. CALDERHEAD. Certainly.

Mr. COWHERD. Now, if I am correct, the pension under the law in this case will be $24 or $30 for this disability?

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. If the gentleman will allow me, I will state that this report is not as full as it ought to be. If this foot were off below the knee so much or above the knee so much, it would entitle him to a pension under the general law at such and such a rate. But in addition to the disability there are peculiar surroundings in the case of this old soldier which are such as to deprive him of all means of usefulness and all opportunity of earning a living for himself. He is old, as I am informed, ill, emaciated, and scarcely able to get about, and is absolutely senile, and the trouble is one not arising entirely from the absence of the limb itself, but from peculiar conditions surrounding it.

The report should have gone very much further and shown the condition of the soldier. I grant you that the gentleman from Missouri is right, and it shows the necessity of the reading of the reports and also the necessity of having the reports complete in their details, so that the House may readily understand the question presented.

But this is not a case like that of a foot cut off or the disability arising from the loss of a foot. This old man, as I understand the testimony, is utterly broken down in health, emaciated in body, senile, as I remember the case, and the committee thought, under the circumstances, that the increase to $40 was but fair and right. I admit that an increase of pension of this character should never be made unless there is something in the case that fully warrants such an increase.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the bill will be laid aside to be reported to the House with favorable recommendation.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

MARIA A. THOMPSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 2622) granting a pension to Maria A. Thompson.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Maria A. Thompson, widow of Charles A. Thompson, assistant surgeon, Thirteenth, and surgeon, Ninetieth Regiments Illinois Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I rise now to ask the reading of the report.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the report will be read.

Mr. TALBERT. I hope gentlemen will allow reports in all these cases to be spread upon the RECORD, so as to show to the House and the country the reason for the action taken. I think it nothing but just and right, and I do not do this in order to kill time; but I submit that the report should be read for the information of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The report will be read in the time of the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. SULLOWAY. The report will go upon the record whether it be read or not.

Mr. TALBERT. The facts embodied in the report should be in possession of the House before being called upon to vote. Besides that, reports do not always go into the records.

Mr. SULLOWAY. The House does not manifest a great appetite for them; but still the gentleman may desire to be gratified in that respect.

Mr. TALBERT. It is not a question of that kind. It is a question that I raise for the information of the House and the country.

Mr. CALDERHEAD. I wish to say, in reply to the gentleman, that the report ought to set out all the reasons which operated with the committee in making its recommendation. They usually attempt to give a full statement of the reasons. The report in this case, however, is a very brief one. We have given this woman what she would have been entitled to under the law. We have given to her this pension for the reason that the evidence in the case before the committee, we believed, warranted us in determining that the death of her husband was traceable to his Army service. The Pension Department, however, did not accept the evidence upon which the House committee acted. For that reason they rejected the claim in the Department. We did accept it, and have made an allowance of $12 a month; and therefore the gentleman can be satisfied when the report goes into the RECORD that it contains a history of the reasons on which the committee made the allowance.

Mr. TALBERT. I ask for the reading of the report.

The CHAIRMAN. The report will be read in the time of the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Has the Chair ruled that no member has a right to have these reports read?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has not ruled that.

Mr. GAINES. Is that the rule of the House?

The CHAIRMAN. The report is now in process of being read in the time of the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. GAINES. I do not care to hear it; but suppose I call for the reading of a report. Have I not that right, under the rule of the House?

The CHAIRMAN. Not if objection is made. No member can call for the reading of a report if objection is made, unless the House votes to hear the report read.

Mr. GAINES. What on God's earth are the reports printed for, if not to enlighten the House?

Mr. MORRIS. They are printed for the members to read.

Mr. GAINES. Let me ask how far back does that ruling go?

Mr. GROSVENOR. It only goes back to Jefferson's Manual; that is all. A part of the rules of the House absolutely prohibits the reading of a report against the objection of a member, unless the House votes that it may be read.

Mr. GAINES. I do not understand that we are in the House now; we are in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, I speak of the House in the proper sense.

The CHAIRMAN. For the information of the committee the Chair will ask the Clerk to read the rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

When the reading of a paper other than one upon which the House is called to give a final vote is demanded, and the same is objected to by any member, it shall be determined without debate by a vote of the House.

Mr. GAINES. Is this report to be considered a paper, a newspaper? It is an official document of this House.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The bill is the thing that the House has to vote upon and not the report. This rule goes back to Jefferson's Manual, and has never been disputed by anybody who knew anything about parliamentary procedure. [Laughter.]

The bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

HATTIE E. REDFIELD.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 1250) granting a pension to Hattie E. Redfield.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Hattie E. Redfield, widow of Charles E. Redfield, late second lieutenant Company A, Forty-second Regiment Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $15 per month.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

EUDORA S. KELLY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 2220) granting an increase of pension to Eudora S. Kelly.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Eudora S. The bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

JAMES M. SIMERAL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 1255) granting an increase of pension to James M. Simeral.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of James M. Simeral, late first lieutenant Company L, First Regiment Iowa Volunteer Cavalry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

LIZZIE H. HYNDMAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 261) granting an increase of pension to Lizzie H. Hyndman.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Lizzie H. Hyndman, widow of William Hyndman, late captain, Fourth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, and pay her a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of the pension she is now receiving.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the reading of the report. I thought it was agreed that the reports should be read.

Mr. BENTON. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina moves that the report be read.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. TALBERT. I demand a division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 4, noes 36.

Mr. TALBERT. No quorum, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will ascertain. [After counting.] One hundred and four gentlemen present, a quorum. The noes have it; and the reading of the report is refused.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

HENRY FRANK.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 1769) granting an increase of pension to Henry Frank.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension roll, subject otherwise to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Henry Frank, late of Company G, Thirty-ninth Regiment of Illinois Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $15 per month in lieu of the pension he is now receiving.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

THOMAS JORDAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 1228) granting an increase of pension to Thomas Jordan.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Thomas Jordan, late of Company G, Sixty-third Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

MARY E. LAW.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 2636) granting an increase of pension to Mary E. Law.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary E. Law, widow of Richard Law, late captain, United States Navy, and pay her a pension at the rate of $40 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

JERUSHA W. STURGIS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 677) granting an increase of pension to Jerusha W. Sturgis.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Jerusha W. Sturgis, widow of Samuel D. Sturgis, late brigadier-general, United States Volunteers, and pay her a pension at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of that she is no receiving.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

HENRY ATKINSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 833) granting an increase of pension to Henry Atkinson.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Henry Atkinson, late of Company G, One hundred and eighth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $25 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the reading of the report.

Mr. GIBSON. I object.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I want to say a few words on this bill. I want to say that I have been a member of this House in former Congresses, and I never objected to the reasonable consideration of any measure. I do not think that more than once or twice during the history of my legislative career have I voted against a pension bill on the floor of this House. I believe that the men who fought for the Union are entitled to a fair, reasonable, and just pension—that they should be paid in meritorious cases.

I have no sympathy with any filibustering tactics to delay the procedure of this House; but I do say to gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber, and to gentlemen on this side, that when a member stands in his place and desires a report to be read for the information of himself and members, that he may know intelligently what he is voting on, it is as reprehensible to deny him that privilege as any filibustering tactics that can be pursued on either side. We come here, men like myself, who have not a pension bill before the committee—come here in your interest to make up a quorum, and we are entitled to have the information that we seek, and not be led blindly to the desk to vote on what we know nothing about.

Mr. GIBSON. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Not now; I do not care to be interrupted. I say it is an injustice, when a report is requested to be read, to apply the strict letter of the rule. Gentlemen come here to make up a quorum, and they have a right to understand and know upon what they are voting.

Mr. GIBSON. Will the gentleman allow me a question now?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes, a question.

Mr. GIBSON. I will ask the gentleman if reports in any other cases are ever read to the House?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course they are.

Mr. GAINES. Always when requested.

Mr. GIBSON. Reports from the Committee on Ways and Means and the Appropriations Committee? Never.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Very frequently reports are read, except in cases where there is protracted debate, and then the members explain the bills themselves. There is hardly ever a bill that comes up by unanimous consent that the report is not read. The object of reading the report is to save time and delay. It would be impossible for every member of the House to take up the pension bills and reports and read and examine them before they come up. If he did, he could not do anything else. Now, when a bill is read at the desk and a member desires further information, I say it is worse than any filibustering tactics to prevent that member from having a just understanding of what he is about to vote for.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that the rule in this House, ever since I have been a member, now for five years, has been to take the action of the House committees as based upon proper evidence and their conclusion as the result of honest action and good faith. We have bills here appropriating tens and hundreds of millions of dollars; and not since I have been a member of this House has a solitary one of the reports on these bills ever been read.

Mr. GAINES. Then why do you have the reports printed? Why not bring the bill in without any report?

Mr. GIBSON. I am glad the gentleman asked that question. They are printed for the information of the members, so that if a member wants a report of the reasons for the bill he can go to the document room and get it.

Mr. GAINES. I understand there are not enough reports there to go round.

Mr. GIBSON. The object of printing the report is not to have it read in the House, but for the information of individual members who wish to invesigate the matter and inform themselves with reference to the subject to which the bill relates. If this House should adopt the practice of reading all the reports, business would be so greatly delayed that it would be impossible in the course of two years to dispose of the public business. The practice is not to read the reports, and never has been since I have been in Congress. When the reading of the reports is called for, in nine times out of ten the object is to create delay. That is the object, the main object, and oftentimes the only object, in calling for the reading of reports upon special pension bills.

The Invalid Pension Committee is composed of men of both political parties. Since I have been a member of that committee, now over three years, no question of politics has ever been raised there. It is indistinguishable to an observer who are the Democratic members of the committee and who are the Republican members; nobody could tell from the action of the committee whether the individual members were Republicans or Democrats. We have looked at the cases before us from the broad standpoint of a charitable patriotism.

I have heard members say, "This man or this woman does not come under the law." Why, sir, if they came under the law, there would be no need for special bills. The object of special bills is to provide for meritorious cases which do not come under the law and also to provide for cases where, in consequence of the generality of the law or in consequence of harsh adjudications by the Pension Bureau, we feel that adequate justice has not been done to some deserving soldier or some widow of a deceased soldier.

Mr. Chairman, we have had a number of these reports read today. In what case has this committee been "turned down?" We hear talk about "fraudulent pensions." What "fraudulent pension" has been recommended by the Invalid Pension Committee? Not one. Where is the member who can rise on this floor and put his finger upon a single "fraudulent pension?" We hear talk about "coffee coolers" and "bounty jumpers" and "deserters." What bill reported by this committee has pensioned any coffee cooler or bounty jumper or deserter? Not one. The fact is that the action of the Invalid Pension Committee——

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. What is the subject under discussion?

The CHAIRMAN. The subject under discussion is the request to have the report read and the refusal of that request.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. I wish we might get at the question.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Chairman, it is very easy for members to get up here and talk about pensioning "bounty jumpers" and "coffee coolers" and "deserters," but this House is not in that business; the Invalid Pension Committee is not in that business, and the man who talks about pensioning those classes of people is not only slandering the committee, but is also casting an unjust, unmerited, and unpatriotic aspersion upon deserving soldiers and deserving widows of soldiers who are being pensioned.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. I make the point of order that the gentleman is not discussing the question at issue.

Mr. GIBSON. I am discussing the very question at issue—whether this report ought to be read. That is the very matter I am discussing.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was in error in stating that the pending question was a motion. The motion was objected to, and, under the parliamentary conditions, that motion is not debatable. Does the gentleman from Tennessee desire to proceed in order? If so, the Chair will recognize him in his own time to speak on the bill.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. I make the point of order that there is no question now pending upon the bill. It is simply a motion——

A MEMBER. An objection.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. An objection; and must be passed on without debate.

Mr. GIBSON. I wish to say this: The gentleman from Indiana has occupied very considerable time of this House——

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order of the gentleman from Indiana is well taken.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Then I insist on it.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TALBERT] insist upon his motion that the report on the bill now pending be read?

Mr. TALBERT. "The gentleman from South Carolina" does not recollect to have made that motion in this case. But if any gentleman wants the report read, I would be glad to hear it. The gentleman from Tennessee has occupied a good deal of time——

Mr. GRAFF. Will the gentleman permit me to state the facts in this case?

Mr. TALBERT. Certainly.

Mr. GRAFF. Three years' service in the war of the rebellion; rheumatism, anchylosis, general debility, nervous prostration—all the result of Army service.

Mr. TALBERT. And the fellow is not dead yet!

Mr. GRAFF. The soldier was alive when the report was made.

Mr. TALBERT. Well, let him have the pension. God knows, if he is not dead, I would be in favor of granting $100 to have him buried. [Laughter.]

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

JAMES A. SOUTHARD.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 1264) granting an increase of pension to James A. Southard.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of James A. Southard, late of Company K, One hundred and twenty-sixth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and Company K, One hundred and fifty-ninth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $24 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

ANNIE A. GIBSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 2742) restoring to the pension roll the name of Annie A. Gibson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to restore to the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Annie A. Gibson, widow of James Walters, of Company E, Thirty-eighth Regiment Massachusetts Volunteers, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Chairman, I would like somebody to tell us why this party was placed upon the pension roll and taken off again and also why the restoration is made. I do not ask for the reading of the report, but some brief explanation will be satisfactory. There must be some reason for the action of the committee.

Mr. SULLOWAY. I will state to the gentleman from Tennessee that this is to restore a remarried widow to the rolls. She is old—58 years of age—nearly blind, and without property. Her pension was at this rate before her remarriage to the second husband, who is now dead.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. She was a widow of the soldier during the war?

Mr. SULLOWAY. Yes.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JULIA M. EDIE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 3017) granting an increase of pension to Julia M. Edie.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Julia M. Edie, widow of John R. Edie, late captain, Ordnance Department, United States Army, and pay her a pension at the rate of $40 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOSEPH W. SKELTON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 2351) granting an increase of pension to Joseph W. Skelton.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Joseph W. Skelton, late first lieutenant, Company F, Seventh Regiment Indiana Volunteer Cavalry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM PADGETT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 2942) granting an increase of pension to William Padgett.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William Padgett, late of Capt. David J. Miller's company, Georgia Militia, Seminole Indian war, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The following amendments, recommended by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, were read:

In line 8 strike out "thirty" and insert "twenty."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

JEREMIAH B. MOORE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3224) granting a pension to Jeremiah B. Moore.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll the name of Jeremiah B. Moore, late a sergeant of Company K, First Massachusetts Volunteers, in the Mexican war, and subsequently lieutenant-colonel of the Third Regiment California Volunteer Infantry in the war of the rebellion, and pay him a pension of $30 per month.

The following amendments, recommended by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, were read:

In line 9 strike out the word "thirty" and substitute therefor the word "twenty," so as to fix the rating at $30 per month, in accordance with precedents in similar cases.

In line 4, after the word "roll," insert the words "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

Add to the end of the bill the words "in lieu of that he is now receiving."

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to Jeremiah B. Moore."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

FLORA B. HINDS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4368) for the relief of Flora B. Hinds.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension roll the name of Flora B. Hinds, late a nurse in the Spanish war, and to pay her a pension at the rate of $30 a month.

The following amendments, recommended by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, were read:

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill granting a pension to Flora B. Hinds."

Strike out "twenty," in line 6, and substitute therefor the word "twelve."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

J. J. ANGEL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1381) granting a pension to J. J. Angel.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Jet. J. Angel, late Second Company, Second Regiment Tennessee Volunteers, Indian war, and to pay him a pension at the rate of $24 per month, and this pension so paid shall be in lieu of pension that claimant is now drawing under certificate No. 2364.

The following amendments, recommended by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, were read:

Change the title so as to read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to James J. Angel."

In line 6 strike out "Jet." and insert "James;" in the same line strike out "Second Company, Second Regiment" and substitute therefor "corporal of Captain McClelland's company."

In line 8 strike out "twenty-four" and insert in lieu thereof the word "twelve."

Strike out all in the bill after the word "month," in line 8, and substitute therefor the words "in lieu of that he is now receiving."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

LILLIAN CAPRON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 1905) granting an increase of pension to Lillian Capron.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Lillian Capron, widow of Allyn K. Capron, late captain Troop L, First Regiment United States Volunteer Cavalry, war with Spain, and pay her a pension at the rate of $40 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The following amendment, recommended by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, was read:

Strike out "forty" and insert "thirty;" so that it will read: "$30 per month."

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I hope this House amendment will not prevail. This bill has passed the Senate at $40. If I am correct in the bill, this lady was the mother of Captain Capron——

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I think the gentleman has the wrong bill.

Mr. BROMWELL. There are two Capron bills.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. This is not the bill the gentleman from Indiana has in mind.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Then I will withdraw what I have said; but if this is the bill for the lady who is the wife of Captain Capron, who died of fever, and who afterwards lost her son during the late war, he being killed in battle——

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. This is not the bill.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Very well; I will withhold what I desired to say until that bill is presented.

Mr. O'GRADY. I should like to know myself, Mr. Chairman, why this bill is to be cut down from forty to thirty dollars per month. I did not hear the explanation of the chairman of the committee.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Chairman, I would say that this bill represents the maximum amount agreed upon by the Committee on Pensions for all widows of officers holding this rank and grade. The committee did not come suddenly to their conclusion of what they deemed was right and proper in these cases, but after giving the matter due consideration; not considering the one isolated case, but all of the cases that were presented to them. In their judgment they believe that $30 a month is as much as ought to be allowed to the widow of any officer of this rank and grade.

Mr. BROMWELL and Mr. O'GRADY rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York.

Mr. O'GRADY. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROMWELL].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROMWELL] is recognized.

Mr. BROMWELL. Mr. Chairman, in addition to what the chairman of the Committee on Pensions has said, I also, as a member of that committee, desire to say that in the matter of all claims that have come before it we have endeavored to be entirely consistent. As the chairman said, we did not take up the first claim that was presented to the committee and fix an arbitrary rate. Neither did we feel that we were bound to adopt the rate fixed by the Senate, because it is a well-known fact that nearly every bill, without regard to the merits of the bill, comes from the Senate with rates allowed far in excess of what has been allowed in the past to meritorious claimants, either before the Committee on Pensions or the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. GAINES. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. BROMWELL. Just let me finish, and then I will answer any question gladly. Now, it seemed to us that the fairest way of reaching reports on these claims—and there are a great many of them, and all of them asking for high rates of pensions, very few less than $50 a month—it seemed to us that before taking up the consideration of any one claim the committee should carefully consider a plan by which all claims could be fairly adjusted.

With that object in view we fixed a maximum rate that should be allowed according to the grade of the soldier. We fixed a rate for lieutenants, captains, majors, lieutenant-colonels, colonels, brigadier and major generals, and that rate we have attempted to adhere to strictly and conscientiously as the maximum rate to be allowed. Where there were any circumstances connected with the claim which would show that there was an income independent of the pension the committee have not reported the maximum rate. Where, however, the claimant had nothing but the pension, and there were no special reasons, either on account of the gallantry of the soldier or the circumstances of the beneficiary, to call for a specially high rate, we have made discriminations and have not reported, as a rule, the maximum amount.

Now, in regard to this particular claim, and others which are going to follow, I will not yield to any gentleman in this House in my admiration and respect for the services of the men who went into the Spanish war and made such a magnificent record for themselves and the country; but I call attention to the fact that, distinguished as those services were, there were thousands of others during the civil war who were equally distinguished and who rendered services equally meritorious; and I for one do not see any good reason why, in the temporary excitement of the present day, we should ignore the claims of the old soldiers and their widows of the civil war by making a rate of fifteen or twenty dollars to them and a rate of forty or fifty dollars to those of the Spanish war.

There were two Caprons, father and son. Their services were distinguished, their conduct gallant, and both died as the result of the Spanish war. The first of these claims is that of the widow of one of these officers. Under the law she would not be entitled to what this bill gives her, even with the House amendment. We are giving her as a bonus an amount in excess of what, under the law, she is entitled to. She went to the Pension Bureau, the facts were all taken into account, the law was taken into account, and she was given a maximum rating and allowed a maximum pension there. Without any additional facts before the committee than what went before the Pension Bureau, the committee nevertheless felt that it was a case where they might, in view of the legislation of this House increasing pensions, give an additional amount on this claim, and we gave her the maximum allowed under our rule.

The action of the Pension Committee has been uniformly consistent in these claims. If you increase any one of them, then in fair justice you will have to increase every claim that is reported from the Pension Committee. We have carefully examined all the facts. We have taken into account the circumstances, pecuniary and otherwise, the physical condition and everything that goes to enter into the question of sympathy in these cases, and we have attempted to act honestly and consistently in every one of them.

Mr. GAINES. Now will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. BROMWELL. Certainly.

Mr. GAINES. Will the gentleman please state the difference between the two bills as to the amount recommended?

Mr. BROMWELL. That is, the first Capron bill——

Mr. GAINES. The bill that is now before the committee.

Mr. BROMWELL. The first Capron bill is for $30 and the other is for $25; and I will explain to the gentleman, although it is a little in advance of the other bill, why we make the distinction. In this case of Lillian Capron she has nothing but the pension; in the case of Agnes Capron, which follows a little further on on the Calendar, she has an income independent of the pension, which would, with the pension, make more than $30.

Mr. GAINES. Now, I understand the Senate has passed a bill which gives this party so much money, and that the House has recommended another figure. Why is the difference between the amounts?

Mr. BROMWELL. The Senate allowed $40 per month, and the House amendment allows $30. I appeal to gentlemen of the House in this initial case, which is the first one, probably, of a number where an attempt will be made to increase these pensions—I appeal to you to be consistent in this matter.

Mr. GAINES. The point you are making is that they are giving a higher figure for the same service than was done in the civil war.

Mr. BROMWELL. I state to the gentleman that there are thousands of pensioners who are widows of officers of the same grade of Captain Capron, and with the same merit, so far as that is concerned, and are getting less money than would be given under this House committee amendment.

Mr. GAINES. Then you object to these large pensions?

Mr. BROMWELL. I object to any enormous increase in these pensions.

Mr. GAINES. Over that which is allowed for the civil war.

Mr. BROMWELL. This is the first case you have growing out of the Spanish war, and it is the first attempt to increase the pension over the report of the Pension Committee. I think it is excessive to allow $40, the amount fixed by the Senate, and I hope the committee will not consent to that amount.

Mr. DE VRIES. What is the amount recommended by the House committee?

Mr. BROMWELL. The House bill recommends $30 a month.

Mr. DE VRIES. This is the case of the wife and not the mother?

Mr. BROMWELL. This is the case of Lillian Capron. They are both widows; one is the widow of the father and the other of the son.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I want to say a few words, and I hope the committee will give me its attention. I want to indorse every word that has been said by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LOUDENSLAGER] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROMWELL]. I have served on that committee, and know they make absolutely no discrimination. They take up every case and investigate it on its merits and try to be consistent. While I served on that committee we never permitted the Senate to go above our rules of what we thought was right, and they have a disposition to do right. I think the committee ought to stand by the rules they have made. They have a maximum amount, and yet they might vary in very exceptional cases. I know at the last session, before pension certificates were hardly issued, a very distinguished gentleman came before that committee and asked us to increase pensions above that given by the law because the matter was recent and the grief was sharp.

Mr. Chairman, the war with Spain technically is over. But the war over the results of that war is not over, and we do not know when it is going to be over; and if we set an example here of almost instantly doubling up and increasing the pensions of the widows of the Spanish war, what are you going to say about the enormous cost of the increase of all widows pensioned up to the same level? Now, this committee have given $30 a month, which is quite a considerable pension; and there ought to be extraordinary reasons advanced why more should be given and why the rule of that committee should be overridden. They commence with a minimum, and if we increase and increase over the increase, where is this matter going to end?

I can not give the details of this case better than they have been given. I am so well acquainted with the members of this committee that I hope this House will not make this initial case more than the amount that the committee has recommended, which is a reasonable and just one, and I hope the House will leave it to the committee hereafter. Put it at $40 and disregard the committee, and then what are you going to do with each and every one that follows? I hope the House will sustain the action of the Committee on Pensions and sustain the amendment, and make this $30 instead of $40. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, this is an initial case, and we all know these people. I think we might as well start off and grant fair pensions to the families of the few men that have been killed in the Spanish war. In this time, when this particular war was fought, the necessities of life are higher, and $40 to-day would not be as much as $30 would be ten or fifteen years ago.

Mr. BROMWELL. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. Yes, sir.

Mr. BROMWELL. If the gentleman says $40 to-day is not so much as $30 would be several years ago, while the old pensioners are only getting $30 a month to-day, does my friend think that $30 will go any further with them than with the Spanish war widows?

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. I can not say; but there are many reasons why we should be liberal with these. I think at this time we are capable of being more liberal than we were in the civil war. I can not see why in pensions granted to the widows of men killed in the Spanish war we can not be liberal. We are talking about $10 a month. There is no man here but what knows a young woman who loses her husband can not be compensated by a pension of $10. We should look at this matter now in a liberal way; and for one on the Democratic side of the House I propose in all these matters of the Spanish war pensions to be consistent in giving all these people the same alike. The work which the soldiers in the late Spanish war accomplished entitled them to all the credit that is properly belonging to them, and it touched our sympathy in this country; and this country will receive a benefit far greater in amount from that war than will be received from any other war.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. The gentleman spoke of the few numbers of pensioners in the Spanish war. Does he know how many have been filed?

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. I know there are many applications, but few applications of widows for the loss of husbands and sons have been allowed. They have undoubted rights, and we should not deny them because people who have no right to a pension have filed so many claims——

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I ask if the gentleman knows the number?

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. You mean how many altogether?

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. There are very nearly 29,000 already filed.

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. How many men were killed in the Spanish war?

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I do not know.

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. How many widows are there on account of loss of husbands, or how many women have lost sons by being killed in the Spanish war?

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I do not know.

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. I would like to ask the gentleman from New Jersey how many pensions up to this time have been granted to applicants who served in the Spanish war, or as dependents?

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I think this is the first one.

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. I mean at the Bureau?

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I do not know the number.

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. Are there not less than 400?

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Every one has been granted a pension that has been considered by this committee and reported to the House. They have all been granted. That was a prerequisite for consideration by the committee.

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. I understand of the 29,000 applications less than 400 have been granted. Of course those have been largely cases where there has been no dispute, where the husband or son, where the soldier, died and the dependent could make a clean case.

Mr. GAINES. I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question.

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. GAINES. You were in the late war and no doubt suffered greater hardship than those who were not in it. Can you tell why there should be a distinction drawn between the widow of a Spanish-war soldier and the widow of a civil-war soldier for identic ly the same service, identically the same disability?

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. I will say to the gentleman from Tennessee that there is one great reason, if he will stop to consider. While it may not apply to this case, because I believe this father and son were shot, but in many cases the United States is largely to blame for there being any pension at all. There was mismanagement, which we all know, and that is one reason why we should be more liberal to the men in the Spanish war.

Mr. GAINES. Suppose a civil-war soldier came up here with one leg off and an eye out, and a Spanish-war soldier in like condition, and they both did exactly the same service. Would you be in favor of giving one $40 a month and the other $30 a month?

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. I would be in favor of giving them both a pension, but that question has no application to this case. Anybody can ask questions.

Mr. GAINES. I am asking you if there should be a distinction when the services are identically the same?

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. This is a case where the widow has lost her husband. Forty dollars a month will not put her back where she was before.

Mr. GAINES. I do not suppose it would; nor a thousand dollars either.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendments recommended by the committee.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

FESTUS DICKINSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2331) to increase the pension of Festus Dickinson.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the pension of Festus Dickinson be increased from the sum of $12, the amount now being paid him, to the sum of $20 per month.

The following amendments, recommended by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, were read:

Change the title so as to read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to Festus Dickinson."

Strike out all after the enacting clause and substitute therefor the words: "That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Festus Dickinson, late captain's clerk, United States Navy, war with Mexico, and pay him a pension at the rate of $16 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

PLEASANT H. M'BRIDE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7624) to increase the pension of Pleasant H. McBride.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase to the sum of $40 a month the pension of Pleasant H. McBride, late sergeant, Company I, First Tennessee Mounted Volunteers, Mexican war, said pension to be in lieu of pension No. 8768.

The following amendments, recommended by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, were read:

Change the title so as to read: "A bill granting a pension to Pleasant H. McBride."

Strike out all after the words "directed to," in line 4, and substitute in lieu thereof the words "place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Pleasant H. McBride, late sergeant in Capt. L. D. Newman's company, First Tennessee Mounted Volunteers, war with Mexico, and pay him a pension at the rate of $12 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

CATHARINE A. BROWN.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask unanimous consent of the committee to take up a bill of an old woman 84 years old, who is as blind as she can be, worth not a dollar on earth to live on except what is furnished her by her friends, and I am afraid she may die before I can get her bill up.

Mr. SULLOWAY. I hope that request will be granted.

Mr. COX. The Calendar number is 562.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Cox] asks unanimous consent that House bill 9574 be now taken up. If there is no objection, the Clerk will read the bill.

There was no objection.

The bill (H. R. 9574) to increase pension of Catharine Brown, widow of Frank Brown, was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the pension of Mrs. Catharine Brown, widow of Frank Brown, be increased from $8 per month to $20 per month.

The amendments reported by the Committee on Pensions were read and agreed to, as follows:

Change the title so as to read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to Catharine A. Brown."

Strike out all after the enacting clause and substitute therefor the following:

"That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Catharine A. Brown, widow of Benjamin F. Brown, late of Captain Crouch's company, First Tennessee Mounted Volunteers, Indian war, and pay her a pension at the rate of $20 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving."

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to announce in all fairness that I shall hereafter object to any pension bill being taken up out of its regular order. My object is that business may go along with continuity and that we may have before us such cases as have been regularly reported, and the bills and reports of which are before the House.

GEORGE H. FRENCH.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4520) increasing the pension of George H. French, Company A, Forty-eighth Wisconsin Infantry.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to place upon the pension roll of the United States, at the rate of $20 per month, George H. French, who served in Company A of the Forty-eighth Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, in lieu of the pension he now draws under certificate No. 565447.

The amendments reported by the Committee on Invalid Pensions were read and agreed to, as follows:

Strike out all after the word "place," in line 4, and insert the following: "on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of George H. French, late of Company A, Forty-eighth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $20 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving."

Amend title so as to read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to George H. French."

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

AGNES K. CAPRON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 1906) granting an increase of pension to Agnes K. Capron.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Agnes K. Capron, widow of Allyn Capron, late captain, First Regiment United States Artillery, and pay her a pension at the rate of $40 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Invalid Pensions was read, as follows:

In line 8 strike out "forty" and insert "twenty-five;" so as to make the rate of the pension $25 per month.

Mr. O'GRADY. I should like to hear the reasons which influenced the committee in reporting this amendment.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. In reply to the inquiry of the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'GRADY], I desire to say that the reason this bill was not reported by the committee at the maximum rate of $30 a month was that this widow is possessed of a certain amount of property outside of the pension she is now receiving.

In disposing of these cases the committee has considered that in order to be entitled to the maximum amount the claimant should not have any property—should be totally dependent upon the pension for support. We believe in making a discrimination between those widows who are left totally helpless, without property, without any means of support, and those who are entirely dependent, and those who have possibly thousands of dollars out at interest. We think that the latter class ought not to be as largely benefited by the bounty of this Government as those who are entirely destitute—without any means of support. That is the reason we have not reported the maximum amount.

Mr. O'GRADY. Mr. Chairman, as the House probably knows, the beneficiary named in this bill is the widow of Captain Capron, of Capron's Battery. The pension claim under discussion a few moments ago was that of the widow of young Captain Capron, of the Rough Riders. In other words, the son was killed in Cuba, he being among the first of our soldiers to die there, and the father died after his return from Cuba of disease contracted there.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. O'GRADY. Yes, sir.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Is this lady the own mother of the son?

Mr. O'GRADY. I am not familiar with the facts; but the chairman of the committee [Mr. CAPRON], who seems to know, says that this lady is the widow of one soldier and the mother of the other.

This woman has been left with two young children—under 16 years of age. The only property she has is a small amount of insurance she received upon her husband's life.

It seems to me a sufficient reason has not been given by the committee for discriminating between these two women. I am perfectly willing to yield to the committee upon any proposition that is reasonable. I believe that their action on the former bill was proper enough, but I see no reason why they should have discriminated against this woman or why she should not have received the maximum of $30. The small amount of money she has received as insurance upon the life of her husband will not be sufficient to educate her children.

These two soldiers represent the second and third generations of a family of soldiers, beginning with a first generation represented by one who was killed in the Mexican war. It is an unexampled case of distinguished gallantry in each instance, and I believe the House should defeat the amendment proposed by the committee and agree to the amount fixed by the Senate, granting to the widow the maximum amount which the committee is confessedly allowing in such cases.

Mr. GAINES. What is the amount reported?

Mr. O'GRADY. In this case they report a pension of $25 per month to the House. The Senate fixed it at $40 per month. In the case of the widow of the son, which was acted upon a short time ago, they fixed the amount at $30.

Mr. GAINES. I understood the gentleman to speak of some life insurance which this lady had received. What is the amount of it?

Mr. O'GRADY. The amount, I think, is $4,000.

Mr. GAINES. What amount of pension do the children get?

Mr. O'GRADY. The two children are allowed $2 a month, and the insurance of $4,000 at 4 per cent would produce $160 a year.

Mr. BROMWELL. Mr. Chairman, I wish to take the floor for a moment to explain the difference in the two cases.

The statement of Mrs. Capron, in the form of an affidavit now before the committee, shows that she gets $4,000 life insurance. Now, assuming that this is loaned out at 4 per cent, although it may be loaned out at a higher rate, she gets an income of $160 a year from that source. That is something over $13 a month.

Under this bill she gets $25 a month pension and $4 a month for the two children until they become 16 years of age. This amount allowed by the Government, together with the income of $13 a month by way of interest on the $4,000 at 4 per cent, makes $42 a month she will get in the way of income. Now, if there is to be any distinction or discrimination in these matters, it seems to me it should have been made in the other case rather than in this one, where the committee allowed $30 a month. These are the facts and the reason on which the committee bases the distinction.

While the maximum for a captain's widow is $30 a month pension, yet the independent income of this lady, when added to what she is allowed in the pending bill, and the allowance made to the children until they are 16 years of age, will give her far in excess of the other Capron bill; and we see no good reason why the amount of pension should be put at the maximum of $30. That is the reason why the committee acted. Under the law she is entitled to $20, but we give an increase of 25 per cent when we make it $25.

Mr. DE VRIES. How old are these children?

Mr. BROMWELL. It is stated in the report; one is, I think, about 15 years of age and the other 13.

Mr. DE VRIES. And in one year therefore $2 will be cut off of the allowance of this widow, and in another year $2 more.

Mr. BROMWELL. When the law fixes the limit at 16 years, the supposition is that at that age the children would become capable of taking care of themselves or self-supporting. We make a limit of 16 years in all other cases. Instead of being a burden after they are 16 years of age, it is supposed that these boys will be in a position to help themselves and to help their mother.

Mr. DE VRIES. This, I understand, is the pension for the mother of Captain Capron, who was killed in Cuba?

Mr. BROMWELL. Yes; the other was for the wife. One of these officers died of sickness, the other was killed in action. The father died September 18, 1898, of typhoid fever, following an attack of dysentery in Cuba. He had been in the Army for some thirty-five years.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Is it not a fact that he was brevetted major after his death?

Mr. BROMWELL. That is true; but the brevet rank is not taken into consideration in the Pension Bureau or in the consideration of pensions by the Pension Committee; only the actual rank.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. I appreciate that. But does it not show the fact that if he had lived for a few months longer he would have had a major's commission, and his widow would have been entitled to the pension of that rank?

Mr. BROMWELL. Oh, it is true that if he had lived he might have gone into the Philippines and become a major-general. It is true also that if he had lived his widow would not be here now asking for a pension under the pension laws of the country.

Mr. O'GRADY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to add a single word to what I have said. One of the boys of Mrs. Capron is now 15 years and 9 months of age, as I understand it. In four months more the widow will lose the $2 a month pension which she now receives for him. So that it is not right to say that she is going to receive that pension for this boy. The other boy is 13 years of age. She will have to educate these boys after they are 16 until they reach their majority.

Mr. BROMWELL. Even if you count out the $2 a month for the two children, she still will have an income, under this bill, if it passes, of $25 pension and $13 from her life insurance, making $38, which is $8 a month more than was given in the other Capron case, which is equally meritorious.

Mr. O'GRADY. In answer to the gentleman from Ohio, I desire to say that when the committee come in here and say they have agreed upon a certain figure by which they are going to stand, I am willing to stand with them; but when they use their judgment and discriminate as to how much they shall allow for this pensioner or that pensioner in lieu of something which she may have, then I say that this House itself can make that allowance.

It is no more than right and fair that this woman should receive the amount which she has been voted by the Senate, and therefore I hope that the House will disagree to the amendment of the House committee and vote for the amount of this pension as agreed upon by the Senate—$40 a month—voting down the House amendment.

Mr. DE VRIES. Mr. Chairman, I think that in this case the House should at least allow the amount to this widow which has been adopted as the rule of the committee, namely, $30 a month.

It has been developed here that the circumstances which have been taken into account by the committee in order that this widow should be denied $5 a month are two: First, that the children receive $2 per month each, or $4 in all; and second, that she has $4,000 in life insurance.

It has been further developed that the $4 per month for the children will soon terminate under the law. Within one year $2 of that amount will be cut off, and within three years more $2 further of that amount will be cut off; and I submit to this House, in all candor and fairness, that in a fair determination of the pension due this widow we should take into consideration the fact that she has two children to educate and maintain from the age of 16 years until they are able to earn a livelihood for themselves, and this can be no more than equalized by the $4,000 life insurance which she is fortunate enough to possess. I submit, therefore, she should be given at least the amount allowed in other cases, or $30 per month, considering that the $4 allowed for the children and the interest upon the insurance money is offset by the necessity which is upon her of educating and maintaining those children until they are able to maintain themselves.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I desire to say a word or two in reply to the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'GRADY] and of the gentleman from California [Mr. DE VRIES].

In regard to the maximum amount allowed by the committee, we allow the maximum amount to a captain's widow of $30; or, in other words, we grade them according to what we think is equitable and just, from what the regular law allows, twenty to thirty dollars.

The object of the Pensions Committee and of pension legislation in this House in passing special acts was to conform to the line of equity, and I am sure the gentleman from New York or the gentleman from California would not think that equity would be done by establishing the maximum rate in this case and a minimum rate, or between the maximum and minimum rate, in other cases more meritorious.

In my judgment this is a very equitable disposition of this case. As I understand the object of the pension law, it is to keep pensioners from want and from necessity. This widow, under this law, will get more in proportion than the other widow will get under the special law we have just passed.

And I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that the injustice which has been done in the past by special legislation has generally occurred when the applicants had a social standing sufficiently strong to direct the attention of members to their cases.

Before our committee to-day we have bills pending for increases of the pensions of widows of 63 officers who fought in the Spanish war, and we have but one bill for the increase of the pension of the widow of a private in that war.

When you increase a private pension bill here beyond the line of equity and justice, you do inequity and injustice to all other pension claimants, and I trust that the action of this committee will conform to the action of the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. RIDGELY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Certainly.

Mr. RIDGELY. Do you think we would have trouble in getting officers to serve in our Army if we should put them and their dependents upon the same scale as the privates in their pension matters?

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I do not know that we would; but I wish to say, in reply to the gentleman, that not only in the pension laws, but the rules governing all trades and professions recognize ability. So we have recognized it here. But what I want to call the attention of the committee to is, not to go too far; not to make the discrimination too great. The records of these officers are gallant and meritorious; yet behind them, and making it possible for them to make such records, were the boys behind the guns—the boys in blue—and they deserve from us some consideration. We ought not to be for legislation for high pensions for some particular one, but we ought to be for such pension legislation as is equitable and just, and grant pensions that are equitable and just to all. I trust this committee will conform to the action of the Committee on Pensions. The committee have considered all the cases that have been brought before them, and given them what they consider they are fairly entitled to, after a fair consideration; and people should not insist upon having a higher pension or a higher rate of pension than they are willing to accord to like rank and condition. [Loud applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. I desire to say only a few words in reply to the statement made by the gentleman from New Jersey and to call the attention of the House to the fact that Captain Capron was in the Army practically all his life, and yet when he died, owing to the slow manner in which promotions were made, he never was above the rank of captain.

Mr. BROMWELL. And drew a good salary.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. He would have drawn a much larger salary if he had not died in the performance of his duty at Santiago, as can be judged by the number of promotions which have taken place since that date. Captain Capron was brevetted after his death as major, and this should entitle him to greater consideration.

Mr. BROMWELL. That is true.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. In a moment. I think it is a pretty poor spectacle for the House of Representatives, with the Treasury overflowing, as the Secretary of the Treasury said the other day—$80,000,000 surplus this year and $90,000,000 next year—in the case of a man who gave his entire life to his country and died in the service, to give his widow to support her and her family in her declining years but $25 a month.

I think I have as much sympathy for the common soldier as the gentleman from New Jersey has, and I say that if the opinion of the common soldier were consulted, he would insist on a proper pension for the family of a deceased officer. I do not think it is fair to bring up a comparison of that kind in order to influence the House against increasing the pension of this worthy widow. I do not think that when a man has served the Government all his life, has made his oath of allegiance to the Government to defend it with his life, as he did in this instance, and then in the declining years of her life, when the widow seeks the Government for support, that this House of Representatives can justly say that $25 per month is a sufficient pension.

I would like to ask any member of Congress on this floor, if he should die to-morrow, after his wife and family had been accustomed to living at the rate of $3,000 per year, as was the case with this officer, how he would like to see that wife and family eke out an existence on $25 per month? Mr. Chairman, this is the richest Government on the face of God's earth. Every time its life has been threatened it was the same common soldier and sailor, led by the trained officers of the Army and Navy, who saved the Government, and we should be liberal in our treatment of the families of these men. I think the taxpayer, whom some of the gentlemen in the House are so anxious to protect, is anxious and willing to give the soldier his just due, and I do not think there is a fair-minded citizen in this country to-day who thinks $25 per month is sufficient pension for the widow of such a brave, noble, and distinguished officer as Captain Capron.

Mr. RIDGELY. Mr. Chairman, on behalf of privates and dependents of privates who have pension bills pending upon this Calendar, I hope this discussion may end. We have heard both sides. It is simply a question of $5 a month involved to the widow of an officer, and I hope this discussion may end right here and let us vote. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania and Mr. LOUD rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania having spoken once before, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from California.

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. I have not spoken on this claim.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from California.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I hope the Committee on Pensions will recognize the difficulty of the situation that confronts them. It is but the result of your own vicious system. You have attempted to discriminate between two widows, unfortunately bearing the same name. It would seem to me from a casual glance that the widow of the other officer had the most equity, in that her husband had the longest service; but I can not understand how any reasonable man could advocate an increase of pension in either of these cases above what the law gives them.

Now, as the chairman of the Committee on Pensions says, 63 cases are before him at present. I think about all of them passed the other branch of Congress. I think every application that has been made, and so far has received consideration at the hands of the other body, has passed. Now, this condition confronts you. You are going to increase the pensions of the widow of every officer who lost his life incidentally as the result of the late Spanish war.

Is it fair or decent to do this? Is it not the decent thing to do, if you think the widow of a captain ought to have $25 or $30, to pass a general law? The committee say they have fixed the maximum, and I can not understand why the committee should assume the right to fix the maximum compensation of a widow when the law itself has fixed the maximum, beyond which they have no right to go, except when they consider the equities of that particular case; and when we consider the equities of a particular case, we consider the special meritorious and gallant services of the late husband.

Mr. BROMWELL. May I suggest to the gentleman that the Committee on Pensions has, in many instances, turned down bills calling for more than the law allows when there were no circumstances of merit in the claim. These two Capron cases, for the reason stated by the gentleman from Massachusetts and the gentleman from New York, by reason of distinguished services, were considered cases where the committee could conscientiously recommend something beyond the law. I will say to the gentleman from California, and to the members of this House, that we have turned down and laid upon the table a number of cases where there were no special circumstances of merit entitling the claimant to anything beyond the amount allowed by law.

The committee has attempted to do just what the gentleman from California suggests—conform to the law. In ordinary cases that had no merit in them, or special circumstances of hardship and suffering, the committee have turned those claims down and laid them on the table, and they will not come to the House for action. We have not felt constrained in every case where a bill came before us to necessarily report the maximum. Every case has received individual consideration, not alone by the members of the subcommittee, but by the Committee on Pensions itself.

Mr. LOUD. I want to say in regard to the Committee on Pensions that they not only deserve the thanks of this Congress, but the thanks of the whole country for striving to the best of their ability to stem the tide which it seems is covering us all. So much for the committee. Now, let us take the case of Lillian Capron. I find that this officer entered the service in October, 1890. It is true he was killed. Yet it is true that there were many thousands killed in the struggle from 1861 to 1865. Why should the widow of a person who was killed in the Spanish war be entitled to and receive any more consideration than any other widow? I fail to see. Was it a more holy war? One was undertaken, as acknowledged by all to-day, North and South, to sustain and perpetuate the nation. The other, as some people believe, was to subjugate a people. But whatever the cause of the last war, was it any more holy than the other? I ask you, Mr. Chairman, and members of this House, were their services any greater or more meritorious than those during the war from 1861 to 1865?

Now, you are establishing a precedent here that wherever a widow of a person who died as the result, incidentally or otherwise, of the late war, who was a captain, you will give her at least $25 a month if she has got the courage to come to Congress; and if she has got a good many friends you will give her $30, and then the other body will give her $40 or $50; and when your bills get into conference the inevitable result will follow there. The Committee on Pensions will be swept along, as they have been so far, and will be swept still further along by the other branch of Congress, and you will find yourselves giving to widows of officers of the late war $10, $15, $25 a month in every instance in excess of the law where no man can reasonably assume that there is even equity.

I did not desire to speak on this pension question until we reached these very cases. This is the threshold; to-day you are setting the precedent for all time to come. As I pointed out to the House three or four weeks ago, our friends on this side of the House are as much interested in pushing these cases of the Spanish war widows as you are upon that side. Perhaps it is well, as I suggested to you before, perhaps the more speed with which you can pass these cases the greater the number you can pass, may accomplish results that all honest men wish may come as soon as possible—a thousand an hour, and the country may then begin to ascertain what you are doing.

Mr. DE VRIES. Mr. Chairman, in order to bring before the House one phase of this matter, I desire to submit an amendment to the amendment, striking out "twenty-five" and inserting "thirty;" so that the amount of the pension shall be $30 a month. In support of this amendment I shall submit one or two remarks. We have just passed a bill allowing $30 to Mrs. Lillian Capron, the widow of the son of the lady who is the applicant in the case before the House. We are now considering the case of the mother of the deceased son, who was the husband of Lillian Capron; and it is proposed by the committee to allow her $25 a month—$5 less than we voted to the widow of this lady's son.

The son went into the Army in 1890, and was killed in 1899. The father went into the Army in 1863; served from that date to the time of his death, and died as the result of disease contracted in the Cuban war—the same service in which his son died. The widow of the son has lost a husband; the widow of the father has lost a husband and son. The widow of the son has nobody to depend on for support. The widow of the father has two children depending upon her.

If the committee in this case is going to contend for uniformity, I submit that the pension of the mother who reared the son in order that he might fight in the battles of his country, and who comforted the husband during the years of his service from 1863 down to a very recent period (the father of this husband having fallen in the Mexican war), we can establish uniformity by giving to the mother at least as much as we have given to the widow of the son.

I submit that an allowance of $30 a month is not unfair. I submit that the $4,000 life insurance is more than offset by the duty devolving upon the widow to support, maintain, and educate in a becoming manner two children after the age of 16. While we should be just to the widow, we should not forget the mother, the relict of a brave family of soldiers who have all lost their lives in the battles of our country. The mothers are entitled to our first attention.

Mr. BROMWELL. Mr. Chairman, one minute more and I shall be through. The gentleman who has just taken his seat says that we should make these allowances uniform. That is exactly what the committee propose to do. The gentleman draws a distinction between these two widows, speaking of the one as having children and the other not. He did not refer to the fact that one has $4,000 of money to invest, from which she can derive an income of $13 a month, while the other has not a cent except her pension. I say, let us have uniformity, if we can get it; but we can get it better by following the action of the committee than by adopting any other proposition here submitted.

Mr. THROPP. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from California [Mr. DE VRIES], so as to make the amount of this pension $40 instead of $25.

The CHAIRMAN. The original text of the bill proposed to allow $40, and that allowance will be reached by defeating all the amendments proposing to change that sum. The question before the House is on an amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. DE VRIES] making the amount of the proposed pension $30 instead of $25, as proposed by the committee.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. DE VRIES, it was not agreed to.

The question being again taken upon the amendment of the committee, to strike out $40 and insert $25, it was adopted—ayes 45, noes 34.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, is it in order now to ask unanimous consent that we have a vote on the $30 proposition, so as to make this matter uniform? I do not think there will be any objection to this request.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Massachusetts that the House has, a moment ago, voted down the $30 proposition.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order!

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. I believe I have the floor; and I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. Is there any way in which the Committee of the Whole can vote at the present time on the $30 proposition?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair repeats, that the vote taken a few moments ago was upon that proposition.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I rise to a point of order, which is that the hour of 5 o'clock has arrived, and the Committee must now rise; that no further business is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is not well taken.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD reports Nos. 702 and 714, bearing upon these two pension bills.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

The reports referred to by Mr. GAINES are as follows:

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER, from the Committee on Pensions, submitted the following report:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1905) granting an increase of pension to Lillian Capron, beg to submit the following report and recommend that said bill do pass with an amendment:

The bill is accompanied by Senate Report No. 311, this session, and the following facts are quoted therefrom:

"This bill proposes to grant an increase of pension to Lillian Capron, widow of Allyn K. Capron, late captain Troop L, First Regiment United States Volunteer Cavalry, war with Spain.

"The soldier entered the service as a private in Troop B, Fourth United States Cavalry, October 20, 1890. He was promoted through the grades of corporal and sergeant, and on October 7, 1893, was appointed a second lieutenant, Fifth United States Infantry, and November 30, 1894, was transferred to the Seventh United States Cavalry.

"On the outbreak of the war with Spain he was mustered in as a captain in the First United States Volunteer Cavalry, and by his skill and military knowledge contributed largely to the organization and efficiency of that regiment. His ability and bravery are matters of public knowledge.

"Captain Capron was one of the first victims of the war with Spain, having been killed in battle near Sevilla, Cuba, June 24, 1898.

"The claimant has been allowed a pension of $20 per month, this being the pension provided by the general law for a captain's widow. She has no other income. In her affidavit executed January 24, 1900, she states 'that her only income is the $20 a month pension which she receives as the widow of the said officer, and that this said amount is her only means of support.'

"Testimony of disinterested witnesses is on file with the bill in corroboration of the claimant's statement as to her dependency."

Your committee believes, after very careful consideration of this case, that the facts are sufficient to justify an increase of the claimant's pension, but not to the extent proposed by the Senate bill. The general law rating for the widows of captains of the Army is $20, and it is believed that an increase of 50 per cent in this allowance will give Mrs. Capron substantial relief, and will be as high a rating as can be granted with propriety and justice.

It is therefore recommended that the bill be amended so as to fix the rating at $30 per month.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER also submitted the following report, to accompany the bill S. 1906:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1906) granting an increase of pension to Agnes K. Capron, beg leave to submit the following report and recommend that said bill do pass, with an amendment:

The bill is accompanied by Senate Report No. 312, this session, and the following is quoted therefrom:

"This bill proposes to increase the pension of Agnes K. Capron, widow of Allyn Capron, late captain, First Regiment United States Artillery, from $20 to $75 per month.

"The military records show that soldier was a cadet at the United States Military Academy from September 1, 1863, to June 17, 1867, when he was graduated and appointed second lieutenant, First United States Artillery. He was promoted to first lieutenant August 19, 1873, and to captain December 4, 1888. He was honor graduate of the Artillery School, Fort Monroe, Va., in 1873, and participated in the campaign against the Sioux Indians in 1890 and 1891, being engaged in the battles at Wounded Knee Creek, South Dakota, December 29, 1890, and near Catholic Mission, South Dakota, December 30, 1890. He was commended in General Orders, No. 100, Adjutant-General's Office, December 17, 1891, 'for gallant service in action against hostile Sioux Indians at Wounded Knee Creek, South Dakota, on December 29, and near the Catholic Mission, on White Clay Creek, South Dakota, on December 30, 1890.' He died September 18, 1898, of typhoid fever, following malaria dysentery, contracted in Cuba, having had in the Army twenty-five years of continuous service.

"His widow, the claimant under this bill, is now receiving a pension of $20 per month, with the usual pension for two children under 16 years of age.

"In an affidavit filed with the committee the claimant states that 'her only income is the $20 per month pension she receives as widow of said officer; that she has two children, Paul, aged 15 years, and Webster, aged 13 years, each of whom receives $2 per month; that there are $4,000 insurance money, which will have to be expended for the support and education of the children.'

"In a letter dated January 26, 1900, she states: 'I am now dependent upon Captain Capron's relations.'

"Claimant's allegations as to her financial condition are substantiated by the testimony of witnesses having personal knowledge of the facts."

Your committee fully appreciate the brave and honorable record of this officer and are disposed to make some recognition of it in this bill for the benefit of his widow, but it is not believed that in justice to numerous other widows of captains who draw but $20 the increase of pension to Mrs. Capron should be as large as that proposed by the bill. The claimant is now in receipt of $24 per month ($20 for herself and $2 for each of her two children), and an added allowance of $5 per month will, until her oldest child becomes 16 years of age, make her monthly allowance $29, and this, with her other means, should enable her to live in some degree of comfort.

The Senate bill as passed fixes the rate of pension at $40 per month, and your committee recommend that this be amended so as to fix the rating at $25 per month.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, does the presentation of the motion of the gentleman from New Jersey prevent a motion for the reconsideration of the vote on the thirty-dollar question?

The CHAIRMAN. No motion for reconsideration will be in order.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Chairman, I have made a motion that this bill be laid aside.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the order read providing for this session.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I have already moved that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The CHAIRMAN. The first business will be that the House must come to order. Gentlemen will please be seated.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the rule provides for the adjournment of the session at 5 o'clock on these days. I think the gentleman in the Chair is not quite aware of the order under which we are acting. I may be mistaken; but if I am not mistaken, I think this session must adjourn at 5 o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the order of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That during the remainder of this Congress the second and fourth Friday in each month, after the disposal of such business on the Speaker's table as requires reference only, shall be set apart for the consideration of private pension bills, bills for the removal of political disabilities, and bills removing charges of desertion.

Mr. DALZELL. But, Mr. Chairman, that is not all of the language that is used in the rules.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on laying aside the bill before the House. Without objection it will be laid aside.

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. I object.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I move that it be laid aside.

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. I move that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LOUDENSLAGER] that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly the bill was laid aside to be so reported.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee now rise and report the bills to the House with such action as may have been taken in the Committee of the Whole.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. HEPBURN, as Speaker pro tempore, took the chair.

Mr. CAPRON reported that the Committee of the Whole House, having had under consideration bills of the Senate of the following titles, had directed him to report the same favorably without amendment, and that said bills do pass, viz:

H. R. 9574. A bill granting an increase of pension to Catherine Brown, widow of Frank Brown; and

H. R. 4520. A bill granting an increase of pension to George H. French, Company A, Forty-eighth Wisconsin Infantry.

Mr. CAPRON also reported that the Committee of the Whole House, having had under consideration bills of the Senate of the following titles, had reported them with amendment, and with the recommendation that as amended said bills do pass:

S. 2942. An act granting an increase of pension to William Padgett;

S. 1905. An act granting an increase of pension to Lillian Capron;

S. 1906. An act granting an increase of pension to Agnes Capron.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the previous question may be considered as ordered upon the several bills reported from the Committee of the Whole and the amendments thereto to their passage.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Hampshire?

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I do not object except to the last bill.

Mr. SULLOWAY. That is all right; it is included.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection to the request of the gentleman from New Hampshire, and it is so ordered.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. POWERS, for two weeks, on account of important business.

To Mr. BRUNDIDGE, indefinitely, on account of sickness.
To Mr. YOUNG, for one week, on account of important business.
To Mr. PHILLIPS, for ten days, on account of important business.

The matter has been adjusted by the War Department, and under the circumstances I move that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHOUP, from the Committee on Territories, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4075) to amend an act to prohibit the passage of special or local laws in the Territories, to limit the Territorial indebtedness, and so forth, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

CONSIDERATION OF PENSION BILLS.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I desire to make a request for unanimous consent. If at 3 o'clock this afternoon neither the unfinished business nor the resolution relating to the seating of Mr. Quay shall be before the Senate for consideration, I ask that forty-five minutes be given to the consideration of unobjected pension bills on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that at 3 o'clock to-day, if neither the unfinished business nor the Pennsylvania case shall be under consideration, forty-five minutes may be given to the consideration of unobjected pension cases.

Mr. CARTER. I should like to have the Senator likewise except the Alaska bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; I will do that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator also excepts the Alaska bill. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

LANDS IN BENSON COUNTY, N. DAK.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am directed by the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3670) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Interior to issue a patent to the heir or heirs of one Tawamnoha, or Martha Crayon, conveying to them certain lands in the State of North Dakota, confirming certain conveyances thereof, and for other purposes, to report it with amendments, and I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The Secretary read the bill; and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The first amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, in section 1, line 10, after the word "numbered," to insert "one of section;" so as to make the section read:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, upon due proof of the death of one Tawamnoha, or Martha Crayon, an Indian woman, late of the Devils Lake Sioux Indian Reservation, and due proof of heirship, to issue a patent to her heir or heirs conveying to them the following-described premises, situated in the county of Benson, State of North Dakota, to wit: The lots Nos. 2 and 3 of section 15, the lot No. 1 of section 22, and the southwest quarter of the southwest quarter of section 14, in township 153 north, of range 67 west of the fifth principal meridian, in the State of North Dakota, containing 159 acres and eight one-hundredths of an acre; the said premises being land allotted to her in severalty by trust allotment patent of date November 2, 1892; such patent so to be issued to convey to said heir or heirs the said premises in fee, discharged of any trust or incumbrance whatsoever.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out section 3, in the following words:

SEC. 3. That said heir or heirs are, upon the issuance of said patent, hereby authorized and empowered to sell and convey the said premises, or any part thereof, free of any trust or incumbrance, or to plat or cause to be platted the same, or any part thereof, into city, village, or town lots, and in like manner sell and convey any of such lots.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC SCHOOLS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. STEWART. I present from the Committee on the District of Columbia a supplementary report on the resolution of the Senate in relation to the public schools in the District of Columbia, covering some matters that did not come in in time for the previous report. It is quite important that it should be printed, and I ask that it be printed in connection with the report heretofore made. I move that 500 extra copies of this supplementary report be printed, as it will be in demand in connection with the preceding report.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. WARREN submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $70,000 for continuing the work of constructing quarters, etc., at Fort D. A. Russell, Wyo., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PENROSE submitted an amendment relative to officers of the Navy retired prior to March 3, 1899, and June 30, 1899, intended to be proposed by him to the naval appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HAWLEY submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $200,000 for constructing an addition to the public building at Hartford, Conn., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

READJUSTED SALARIES OF POSTMASTERS IN OHIO.

Mr. FORAKER submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads:

Resolved, That the Postmaster-General be, and he hereby is, directed to report upon a schedule to the Senate the readjusted salaries of all postmasters who served in the State of Ohio between July 1, 1864, and July 1, 1874, whose names as claimants appear in the Court of Claims in the case entitled Hester A. Birdsong and others against the United States, No. 18261, each such stated account to conform in all respects to the order of the Postmaster-General published by circular under date of June 9, 1883, and to the requirement of the act of March 3, 1883, as said requirement was published by the Postmaster-General in the newspapers of the country under date of February 17, 1884, and with such report transmit to the Senate a full copy of the text of the construction by the Postmaster-General of the act of March 3, 1883, embodied in the said circular and publication in the newspapers and in circular form No. 1223, the text of each of which, under date of November 8, 1897, was transmitted by the Postmaster-General to the Attorney-General for use in the case of Jane Yarrington and others against the United States, No. 16345.

HEARINGS BEFORE COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS.

Mr. HAWLEY submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be, and the same is hereby, authorized to employ a stenographer from time to time, as may be necessary, to report such hearings as may be had by the committee or its subcommittees in connection with bills pending before the committee, and to have the same printed for its use, and that such stenographer be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate; and that the stenographer who reported the hearing already had before said committee be paid from said fund.

UNION PACIFIC RAILWAY INDEBTEDNESS.

Mr. MORGAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General be, and is hereby, required to transmit to the Senate copies of all papers connected with the consent filed in October, 1899, on behalf of the United States to the distribution of the receivership fund of the Union Pacific Railway Company in favor of the Union Pacific Railroad Company in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Nebraska, together with all correspondence between the Attorney-General and the special counsel for the United States, John C. Cowin; and also the grounds and reasons of the Department of Justice for agreeing to the appropriation of the fund in question, so that the Union Pacific Railroad Company received $4,000,000 thereof and the United States less than 12 per cent of its claim on said fund, namely, $881,000.

MESSAGES AND PAPERS OF THE PRESIDENTS.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 30,000 additional copies of the document known as Messages and Papers of the Presidents, of which 10,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate and 20,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, the "remainder," if any, to be held by the Superintendent of Documents subject to the future action of Congress.

LAND IN NEWPORT, R. I.

Mr. HAWLEY. I ask for the present consideration of the bill (S. 3679) granting a deed of quitclaim and release to Lorillard Spencer, his heirs and assigns, of all the right, title, and interest in and to certain land in the city of Newport, R. I.

The Secretary read the bill; and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It directs the Secretary of War to execute, acknowledge, and deliver, in the name of the United States of America, a deed of quitclaim and release to Lorillard Spencer, of Newport, R. I., his heirs and assigns, of all the right, title, and interest which was granted to the United States of America by a deed from Elisha Brown to the United States of America, dated the 15th day of November, A. D. 1808, and recorded in volume 11 of the Land Evidence of the city of Newport, in the county of Newport, in the State of Rhode Island, at pages 11 and 12, in and to the land described in the deed, upon the payment by him of the sum of $25.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 9388) to provide better facilities for the safekeeping and disbursement of public moneys in the Philippine Islands and in the islands of Cuba and Porto Rico was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

ELECTION OF SENATORS BY DIRECT VOTE.

Mr. PETTIGREW rose.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I yield.

Mr. BERRY. I ask whether the Chair has laid before the Senate the joint resolution which came over from the House of Representatives this morning proposing an amendment to the Constitution in regard to the election of United States Senators?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has not.

Mr. BERRY. I desire when the Chair lays the joint resolution before the Senate to make a remark or two in regard to it; that is all. I heard it read by title this morning.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask that the message from the House may be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that the joint resolution has not come from the House.

Mr. BERRY. I heard the Clerk report it this morning; at least, I so understood him.

Mr. HALE. It should come in this morning.

Mr. BERRY. And I understood that it was brought in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah [Mr. RAWLINS] introduced a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution for that purpose and had it referred to the committee, but the joint resolution to which the Senator refers has not come from the House.

Mr. BERRY. I possibly may have been mistaken, but I understood the clerk to announce it. I know it passed the House on yesterday. What I desire to say, if the Senator from South Dakota will permit me, I can say right now. It will take only two or three minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield for that purpose?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I yield, Mr. President.

Mr. BERRY. On the second day of the session I introduced a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, directing that United States Senators shall be elected by the people of the respective States. I asked the chairman of the committee to report it in time, if possible, so that we could have a vote on the question during the present session. Yesterday the House of Representatives passed by an overwhelming majority a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution providing for the election of United States Senators by popular vote, as they did at the last session of Congress.

All I desired was to make an appeal to the Committee on Privileges and Elections to bring in a report, either for or against this proposition, so that there may be an opportunity for the Senate of the United States to express its views by a vote.

I do not think there is any question before the American people where so large a majority favor any proposition as favor the proposition to elect United States Senators by the people. I believe it is right to do so, and I think it is but just and fair to them and to the House of Representatives that the Committee on Privileges and Elections shall give us a report on that question, so that a vote can be taken.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, the Committee on Privileges and Elections has had before it, it is true, for two or three months the joint resolution to change the Constitution, submitted by the Senator from Arkansas. During that time the committee has been very much engaged in other business, but now that the opinion of the Senator from Arkansas is reenforced by the House of Representatives the committee will undoubtedly, at the earliest possible opportunity, take up the proposition and consider it.

I am not myself, Mr. President, in favor of the election of United States Senators by the people. No member of the committee, I will say, since the Senator introduced his joint resolution, has asked for a consideration of the subject by the committee. There will now be an opportunity, however, for any such request to be made; and I should be very glad, in response to the appeal of the Senator from Arkansas, myself to call not only his joint resolution, but the joint resolution of the House of Representatives to the attention of the committee at an early day.

Mr. BERRY. I understood the Senator to say that no member of the committee had made the request. The Senator will remember that I spoke to him about the joint resolution I had introduced and asked him to report it early.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, I decline to yield further.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from Arkansas is correct.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Dakota declines to yield further.

SENATOR FROM PENNSYLVANIA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution reported by Mr. TURLEY from the Committee on Privileges and Elections January 23, 1900, as follows:

Resolved, That the Hon. Matthew S. Quay is not entitled to take his seat in this body as a Senator from the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. CHANDLER. If no Senator desires to speak, I shall ask that the resolution may go over until Monday, especially in order that the Senator from South Dakota need not be interrupted in the eloquent remarks which he did not finish on Thursday. I will ask if any Senator wishes to speak on the Pennsylvania resolution today? [A pause.] If not, I request Senators who desire to speak to kindly endeavor to be ready early next week. There is a day fixed for voting upon the resolution and the speeches which Senators desire to make ought not to be postponed too long. I make that request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the resolution will go over until Monday.

SOUTH AFRICAN REPUBLIC.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I ask that my resolution may be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays the resolution before the Senate.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. PETTIGREW February 2, 1900, as follows:

Whereas from the hour of achieving their own independence the people of the United States have regarded with sympathy the struggles of other people to free themselves from European domination: Therefore,

Resolved, That we watch with deep and abiding interest the heroic battle of the South African Republic against cruelty and oppression, and our best hopes go out for the full success of their determined contest for liberty.

Mr. PETTIGREW resumed and concluded the speech begun by him on Thursday last. The entire speech is as follows:

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, it is my opinion that the Senate should pass this resolution of sympathy for the people of South Africa. If we do not, it will be the first time in our history as a Republic that we have failed to express our sympathy and interest, in emphatic terms, for any race or people whatever who were striving to maintain free institutions.

We are parties to the agreement resulting from the conference at The Hague last year; and while I do not believe that America should take up the quarrels of other nations or become complicated in European controversies, it does not appear to me that the Administration has made an honest effort in good faith to comply with and carry out the terms of The Hague agreement. For that agreement provided—

TITLE SECOND.—Of friendly offices and mediation.

ART. 2. In case of serious dissension or of conflict, before the appeal to arms, the signatory powers agree to have recourse, as far as circumstances will permit, to the friendly offices or to the mediation of one or of several friendly powers.

ART 3. Independently of this resort, the signatory powers think it to be useful that one or more powers who have no part in the conflict may offer of their own volition, so far as circumstances may make it appropriate, their friendly offices or their mediation to the states engaged in the conflict. The right to offer these friendly offices or mediation is absolute in the powers which take no part in the conflict even during hostilities. The exercise of this right shall never be considered by either of the parties to the contest as an unfriendly act.

ART. 4. The duty of a mediator consists in conciliating the opposing claims and appeasing the resentment which may have sprung up between the states engaged in the conflict.

ART. 5. The duties of a mediator cease from the moment when it is officially declared by either party to the strife, or by the mediator himself, that the methods of conciliation proposed by him are not accepted.

I can not learn that we have proposed any method of conciliation. It is reported that, in a perfunctory way, our Government asked Great Britain if it could do anything to settle the quarrel. Our plain duty was to have acted before the first gun was fired, and then, if refused, to have at once expressed our disapproval of England's course by passing resolutions of sympathy for the South Africa Republics.

Instead of taking the most American course our Administration has allowed the world to believe we are in full sympathy with Great Britain. Even if there is not a verbal understanding between Mr. Hay, our Secretary of State, and the English Government, approved by the President, it is evident that as long as Mr. McKinley is in power England will have at least the moral support of the United States in whatsoever she may do. I believe that there is such an understanding, for in no other way can I explain the course and conduct of the President.

There is strong corroboration of this view in the visit of the Senator from Ohio, Mr. HANNA, to England last year, and his great admiration for the English Government, expressed on his return.

The struggle going on in South Africa is between the same despotic power, intensified a hundredfold, that over a century ago endeavored to destroy liberty on the American continent and a republic weaker in numbers than we were when we made our triumphant resistance to British tyranny.

Who can say that the Boers are not prompted by as lofty a patriotism, by as ardent a desire for freedom, as inspired our forefathers in that Revolution which, in 1776, brought our own Republic into being as a model after which the liberty of the world has been fashioned.

Under the conditions and circumstances grouped about the origin of our Government and the historical events attending its course of development, the most unnatural alliance for us to make is an English alliance. Our most natural alliance would be one of sympathy with the heroic defenders of the Transvaal, who have been winning victories that take their places beside Marathon, Bunker Hill, and Lexington.

And in response, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, a wave of enthusiasm moves across our continent, and in public meetings the hope everywhere finds expression that the Republic of South Africa shall not perish from the earth, and that the red uplifted hand of British greed may be stayed.

Why, then, did not our Executive take action in behalf of liberty and humanity, action that would have convinced the world that we still believed liberty and humanity should prompt nations in their dealings with each other? Simply because he is engaged in the same wretched business as that which is drenching the soil of Africa with the blood of martyrs. He is busy with an effort to rob the people of the Philippine Islands, and is slaughtering those who resist robbery because, forsooth, it will pay, because they are rich and are worth robbing, and because their island possessions will furnish a foothold for other robberies. The Executive has the power to intercede in behalf of the South African Republic, and if he had spoken as Cleveland spoke in the Venezuela case, there would have been no war in South Africa. But the President will not avail himself of the humane opportunity. The duty is then upon us to act.

Who are these people that excite our sympathy?

They are of our own race. The same blood courses in their veins and in our veins. They sprang from the Dutch, who drove Phillip out of Holland, and from the French Huguenots, who fled to Holland rather than surrender their convictions. Their career in South Africa is a living, burning page in the history of the world, and the impress of their earnestness comes down to the children of the thirteen colonies through the adoption of the alternative so eloquently voiced by the patriot Virginian, "Give me liberty or give me death."

I hope to enjoy the day when England shall have been driven from every foot of the soil of Africa and a republic of united and happily governed states constructed on the ruins of her despotic power. England has conquered no people but to rob them, has governed no race but to blight it with the curse of her presence. The Boers know her methods and their results better than any people in the world. Sixty-five years ago they left their homes in Cape Colony and fled into the wilderness, preferring to wander in the desert and fight for an existence against the savage tribes of that region than accept the pretended protection of a nation of canting hypocrites.

The South African Republic and the Orange Free State are in the interior of South Africa, and neither of these Republics touches the coast at any point. The South African Republic is separated from the Indian Ocean by a long, narrow strip of coast land, from 30 to 60 miles in width, owned by Portugal. The chief seaport is Lourenco Marquez, on Delagoa Bay. Both of these Republics are dry, treeless, elevated plains, broken by mountain ranges, like Wyoming. They are naturally too dry for successful cultivation, but are covered with the rich grasses of semiarid growth. Farming is carried on through irrigation. Small patches of ground along the low river bottoms produce crops without irrigation, but their area is limited. Timber is scarce and is found only upon land contiguous to the streams. The principal industry is raising cattle, and the population is scattered over wide areas in isolated communities.

The area of the South African Republic (or the Transvaal) is 119,139 square miles.

Its population in 1898 was 336,400 whites—137,900 men and 107,450 women and 101,000 children—with a black population of 748,750 persons. Pretoria, the capital, has a population of 10,000.

Johannesburg, which is the gold-mining center, has a population of 108,063 people—79,500 men and 28,763 women; the whites, 60,000; Chinese, 4,800; black, 42,500. In the Transvaal there are 10,000 Jews. The rest of the population are Protestants, mostly Dutch Reform and Lutheran. The Republic owns the railroads and telegraph lines. The total revenue is over twenty millions; but this includes railroads, telegraph, postal receipts, and the sale of explosives.

The government is a republic.

The legislature consists of two houses of 27 members each.

No person can be a member of either house unless he is 30 years of age and possessed of fixed property. The term of service is four years.

The first chamber is elected by the first-class burghers.

The first-class burghers are white male persons residing in the republic prior to 1876, or those who fought in the wars of the republic, including the Jameson raid, and the children of such persons over 16 years of age.

The second chamber of the legislature is elected by the first and second class burghers.

Second-class burghers are naturalized citizens and their children over 16 years of age.

Naturalization may be obtained after two years' residence by taking the oath of allegiance and paying $10.

Naturalized burghers may become first-class burghers after twelve years.

Sons of naturalized burghers may become naturalized burghers at 18 years of age.

First-class burghers ten years thereafter.

The president and commanding general are elected by the first-class burghers only.

The executive authority is vested in a president, elected for five years, assisted by a council of four members.

The Orange Free State is south of the Transvaal, and has an area of 48,300 square miles, and in 1890 had a population of 77,700 whites and 130,000 blacks or natives.

The capital is Bloemfontein, with a population of 2,077 whites and 1,300 blacks.

The railroads and telegraph lines are owned by the government.

Exclusive of the railroads the revenues in 1897 was $2,010,000, and the expenses $1,905,000.

Government.—Written constitution. President elected for five years by voters. Executive council consists of the secretary and four others.

Legislature.—Popular assembly; 60 members, elected by popular vote for four years, one-half every two years; salary, $10 per day; qualification, burghers 25 years old, owner of real estate valued at $2,500. Voters, white burghers, by birth or naturalization, who own real property worth $750 or pay a rent of $180 per annum or a yearly income of not less than $1,000 or own personal property worth $1,500.

Law.—Roman Dutch. Supreme court, composed of three judges. Circuit courts.

Religion.—Dutch Reform, 68,940; English Episcopal, 1,353; Methodist, 753; Lutheran, 312; Roman Catholic, 416; Jews, 113.

Education, free, compulsory, and universal. Two daily and two weekly papers.

Every man over 16 years of age or under 60 is enrolled in the militia and trained to handle arms, but the standing army is very small, consisting of a few trained artillerymen. The total white population of these two Republics is less than 500,000, and they are to-day holding in check and have repeatedly defeated the greatest army England ever sent from her shores. Their army has no doubt received many recruits from Cape Colony.

Cape Colony is a British colony, and embraces the southern coast of Africa, possessing an area of 191,400 square miles, with a population of 956,900 people in 1891. Of these 336,900 are European, three-fourths of the white population Dutch, and those who first occupied Cape Colony were the ancestors of the Boers of the two Republics now at war with Great Britain.

Cape Colony was settled by the Dutch in 1652, when a number of Hollan l farmers were land d at Table Bay, now Cape Town, for the purpose of raising vegetables and cattle to supply the Dutch vessels engaged in trade with India, Java, and Borneo. This trade was very profitable and the settlement prospered. The vessels of all nations trading with the East put in here to secure fresh supplies, and thus the farmers found a good market for all their crops. Families arrived each year from Holland, and the settlement spread along the coast and into the interior and engaged in all kinds of agriculture and stock raising. They made slaves and servants of members of the native tribes of blacks, compelling them to cease their wandering habit and establish themselves in permanent settlements.

In 1795 England, being at war with Holland, sent a fleet and an army to South Africa and captured Cape Town and garrisoned it. England held the colony until 1803, and then surrendered it to the Batavian Republic; but in 1806, the Batavian Republic having been conquered by Napoleon and erected into the Kingdom of Holland, with Louis Bonaparte upon the throne, England sent a fleet of ships and an army of soldiers and again captured Cape Town and resumed the government of the country.

In 1814, when Holland again became independent and the monarchy was restored, England refused to surrender Cape Colony, but annexed it to the British Empire and paid Holland $30,000,000 for a quitclaim title to the colony.

England despised the Dutch and her officers treated them with contempt, and under her domineering rule the people were oppressed.

All semblance of a republican form of government was abolished.

Civil offices were filled from England with broken members of Parliament, with bad, if any, character.

Adventurers, worthless sons of distinguished men, were commissioned to rule the colonists, and places were even bartered away for money.

The English language was made the official language, and no man could serve on a jury unless he could speak English. In the country the people were not able to employ the English language. All trials, therefore, had to be conducted in Cape Town; and men charged with offenses were taken long distances from their homes and tried by a jury of foreigners, whose language the victims of so-called justice could not understand.

The vagrant laws were repealed, and the consequence was that the country swarmed with Hottentots, who begged from and robbed the settlers and became worthless, diseased tramps. They were rapidly becoming extinct under this loose system, although while the strict Dutch rules were in vogue these natives had been giving promise of rapid civilization.

The Dutch have demonstrated superior ability in civilizing inferior races and seldom go to war with them, while the English have developed no capacity in that direction. Where the contact is close and constant, English rule has resulted in ceaseless conflict, wearisome war, and the final extinction of the inferior race by the sword and by disease.

Finally England freed the slaves of the colonists under a proposition to pay about half their value to their owners. Payment for the slaves was to be made in London, and so the Dutch farmers found themselves the victims of claim agents, and, being under the disadvantage of inability to speak the language, many never presented their claims. Those who did were robbed by attorneys, agents, and middlemen, so that they realized only one-quarter of the value of the property.

The Dutch, had they been accorded proper treatment, would have been contented and would have made loyal citizens. They would have united in marriage with English settlers who had begun to locate in the colony, for they were of the same family or race as the English. But England treated them as conquered subjects, as an inferior race, as people fit only to be trampled upon. Thus, after almost a century, she is reaping the fruits of tyranny in a war waged in self-defense by the descendants of those people who should and would have remained loyal under the beneficent management of a humane government.

Great Britain is gathering the harvest of a policy that is testing the strength of the Empire and may accomplish its overthrow. One thing is certain: England's prestige is gone and the limit of her aggressive empire has been reached. Decay, rapid decay, will now set in. The reflex influence of a century of wrong practiced upon others has destroyed the manhood and the character of the people at home, and the ranks of her armies are no longer filled by the sturdy farmers of the days of Drake and Howard.

In discussing the events that follow I have drawn my information from British sources alone.

South Africa, by George M. Theal, page 175:

It is not a pleasant admission for an Englishman to make, but it is the truth, that it would be difficult to find in any part of the world a people with so much cause to be discontented as were the old inhabitants of Cape Colony for many years after the fall of the ministry of the Earl of Liverpool.

Page 196, Theal gives the cause of the Dutch leaving Cape Colony:

First. There was subjection by a foreign and unsympathetic government.

Second. There was prohibition of their language in the public offices and the courts of law.

Third. There was the superintendent of the London Missionary Society, their ablest and most relentless opponent, in possession of boundless influence with the British authorities.

Fourth. There were the slanderous statements made by the philanthropic societies of England concerning them.

Fifth. There was the sudden emancipation of their slaves without adequate compensation.

Sixth. There was the whole mass of the colored people placed upon a political footing with them, and that without a vagrant act being put in force.

Seventh. There was no security for life or property in the eastern districts, which were exposed to invasion by the Kosas, as the secretary of state took part with the barbarians.

These were the chief causes of the great emigration, and there were many others of less importance.

Froude, Oceana (page 39), sides with the Boers and gives the same reason for their departure.

Bryce, M. P., in North American Review, December, 1899:

She [England] altered the system of courts and local government, reducing the rights which the people had enjoyed. She insisted on the use of the English language to the exclusion of Dutch. In undertaking to protect the natives and the slaves whom the Dutch were accused by the English missionaries of treating very harshly, that the missionaries sometimes maligned them and greatly resented the attention which was paid to the charges. Finally she abolished slavery and allotted a very inadequate sum as compensation to the South African slaveholders, much of which sum never reached their hands because it was made payable in London.

For these reasons, in 1836 thousands of the Dutch abandoned their homes, took their cattle and personal property, made domiciles of their wagons, and started northward into the wilderness, fighting their way or making their peace with the savage tribes. They crossed the Orange River and then considered themselves beyond English dominion, for over and over again England had declared that she would not enlarge her possessions in South Africa. Here the settlers established a rude republic, and enjoyed the freedom implanted in their natures generations ago. To these descendants of the men who let the sea in upon Holland rather than submit to the hateful rule of the Duke of Alva, liberty was dearer than life.

That portion of Africa to which these people had gone in search of a land where freedom might thrive without restraint was dry and fit only for grazing purposes. It lies in the high plains region at the head of the Orange River. Along the east coast of southern Africa there is thrown a chain of high mountains parallel with the sea.

Some of the migrating settlers crossed the mountains and found their eastern slopes plenteously clothed with rich vegetation. Near the coast semitropical plants grew in luxurious abundance. Rains gave the soil an adequate supply of moisture, and the streams plunged over great precipices down to the sea. At what is now Durban was found a fine harbor. Many of the emigrants followed the transmountain explorers and settled along the east slope, contiguous to the sea. Here, however, the Dutch home seekers ran counter to England's scheme of benevolence toward mankind (for we of the United States are not the originators of governmental desire to make all people happy), and the sturdy wanderers were forced by British bayonets to recross the mountain chain and occupy the inhospitable plateaus of the semiarid belt. The country about Durban, the colony of Natal, the coast line the Boers had hoped to make lodgment upon, was promptly annexed to the Empire of Great Britain, and England thanked God that the circumference of the sea was safe from the occupancy of any other power.

The Boers, determined not to submit to British rule, went back over the mountains and located upon plains between the Orange River and the Vaal River, some of their number crossing the Vaal and settling in what is known as the Transvaal. England, however, adhered to the dogma that "Once a British subject, always a British subject;" that by migrating to and subduing new land these sturdy farmers, fleeing from English oppression, were extending the domain of the Crown, and so in 1846 England affirmed her title by arbitrarily annexing all the country between the Orange and the Vaal rivers, embracing what is now the Orange Free State. A war ensued. The Boers were defeated at Bloemfontein by an army dispatched from Cape Town to enforce the merciless edict of an implacable sovereign.

Froude (an Englishman) has truthfully written that England always hates those whom she has injured. But with the aid of the Boers beyond the Vaal the republic maintained the contest, with varying success, until 1852, when England made a treaty with the Boers by which she recognized the Dutch settlement beyond the Vaal as a free and independent state. In 1854, by treaty, England also recognized the independence of the Orange Free State. The treaty of 1852 was confirmed by the cabinet of Lord Derby, and the treaty of 1854 was confirmed by the cabinet of Lord Aberdeen. Thus both of the English political parties participated in the recognition of these two Republics as independent states.

Following the treaty of 1852, peace reigned for seventeen years. In 1869 a dispute arose concerning the boundary between the Orange Free State and the native tribes. England interfered and after some fighting decided in favor of the Orange Free State, and a treaty was signed, called the treaty of Aliwal North, fixing the boundary of the Orange Free State so as to embrace all the territory in which the South African (or Kimberley) diamond mines were located.

Froude may tell the story of English duplicity and treachery. I read from pages 45 and 46 of his Oceana:

> The ink on the treaty of Aliwal North was scarcely dry when diamonds were discovered in large quantities in a district which we had ourselves treated as a part of the Orange territory before our first withdrawal, and which had ever since been administered by Orange Free State magistrates. There was a rush of diggers from all parts of the country. There was a genuine fear that the Boers would be unable to control the flock of vultures which was gathering over so rich a prey. There was a notion also that the finest diamond mine in the world ought not to be lost to the British Empire. It was discovered that the part of the country in which it lay was not a part of the Free State at all and that it belonged to a Griqua chief named Waterboer. The chief, in past times, had been an ally of the English. The Boers were accused of having robbed him. He appealed for help and in an evil hour we lent ourselves to an aggression for which there was no excuse. Lord Kimberly gave his name to the new settlement.
> The Dutch were expelled. They did not resist, but they yielded under protest to superior forces, and from that day no Boer in South Africa has been able to trust to English promise. The manner in which we acted or allowed our representatives to act was insolent in its cynicism.
> We had gone in as the champions of the oppressed Waterboer. We gave Waterboer and his Griquas a tenth of the territory. We kept the rest, and all that was valuable, for ourselves. What could the Dutch have done worse? We have accused them of breaking their engagement with us, and it was we who taught them the lesson. A treaty but a few months old was staring us in the face. Even if Waterboer's title had been as good as his friends pretended, we had pledged ourselves to meddle no more in such matters, in language as plain as words could make it.
> Our conduct would have been less entirely intolerable if we had rested simply on superior strength—if we had told the Boers simply that we must have the diamond fields and intended to take them; but we poisoned the wound and we justified our action by posing before the world as the protectors of the rights of native tribes whom we accuse them of having wronged.
> And we maintained this attitude through the controversy which afterwards arose. I had myself inquired subsequently into the details of this transaction, perhaps the most discreditable in the annals of English history.

Theal (an English writer), South Africa, page 325, finishes the story in the following language:

> President Brand, of the Free State, then went to England and laid the case before the imperial authorities. In brief it was this: That Great Britain had taken the land from the Free State under pretense that it belonged to Waterboer, and that a British court after a careful examination had decided that Waterboer had no right to it. The reply which Brand received was to the effect that it was a necessity for the paramount power in South Africa to be in possession of the diamond mines, but he would receive $450,000 for Griqualand West, which contained the diamond fields, as a solution. This sum President Brand accepted. There was no other way.

English honor went for naught. The Boers had long since found that out, and hatred of England and of Englishmen had become an inherited trait of Boer character.

The country beyond the Vaal was loosely governed. The Boers did not like to pay taxes, so each community would meet occasionally in mass meeting and make their own laws, being better satisfied with the home product than with the kind sent them from the charnel house of corruption across the seas.

The blacks outnumbered the whites and the disparity in numbers emboldened the natives. Conflicts between roving bands and the settlers were a result of this condition. The situation furnished the excuse, and in 1877 England marched an armed force into the Transvaal and declared that it was annexed to the British Crown as a colony, under the pretext of establishing a stable government for the protection of life and property.

The Boers did not at first resist this usurpation of government and seizure of territory. They were scattered over wide areas, were poor, and it was not easy to mobilize for defense. In order to avert any tendency toward resistance, the robber government promised the Boers a system of local self-government. It happened, as usual, that the English officials failed to keep their promises, and they became arrogant, insolent, and offensive in the collection of taxes. This condition, forced upon the Boers, continued until 1880, when they revolted, made prisoners of the English garrison, occupied the passes leading to Natal and in three engagements defeated their oppressors, killing over three hundred and wounding as many more. The loss of the farmer warriors in these encounters was 17 killed and 28 wounded.

Following these bloody events came the famous and historic battle of Majuba Hill. During the darkness of the night of February 26, 1881, a force of 600 British troops occupied a high hill which commanded the Boer position. With the dawn of the succeeding day the Boer commander, General Joubert, discovered the presence of England's fighting force on the crest high above him. It was an advantage that must be overcome, as its retention involved grave consequences to the cause for which General Joubert had armed his followers. The emergency demanded prompt action and the general called for volunteers to storm the height. In response 150 intrepid Dutchmen stepped forward and offered themselves as a forlorn hope to scale the hill and drive the British away. They were placed under command of Nicholas Smit. After several hours of laborious ascent, Smit reached the top of the elevation at noon with about 80 of his followers. In the face of this heroic success the enemy gave way to panic and fled, suffering the loss of 92 killed, 134 wounded, and 59 prisoners. It was the charge of the old 600 reversed. Theirs not to question why; theirs but to run or die. And they went, leaving among the slain the body of their commander, General Colley. The loss to the Boers was 1 killed and 5 wounded in this sanguinary affair. English historians who belong to the ruling oligarchy of Great Britain say that they were defeated at Majuba Hill by an overwhelming force of Boers, but they give no figures.

The paternal home Government now hurried reenforcements to Africa to wipe out the disgrace of Majuba Hill, but up to date the account has not been squared, unless the surrender of Cronje, with his 3,000 men, to Lord Roberts's army of 78,000, after killing and wounding more English than he had men in his command and holding the British army at bay for months, can be considered as squaring the account.

Gen. Sir Evelyn Wood was in command of the new levy of 12,000 men who took the field against the Boers. It appears, however, that he deemed discretion the better part of valor, for on the 5th of March an armistice was concluded between Sir Wood and the farmer triumvirate, Paul Kruger, M. W. Pretorius, and Peter Joubert, and this was soon followed by peace, with independence restored to the South African Republic.

The terms agreed upon included a provision recognizing England's suzerainty and the right of that Government to regulate the foreign affairs of the Transvaal, so that no treaty could be made with any foreign state (excepting only the Orange Free State) without England's consent.

Having thus recovered their internal independence, the Boers began immediately to plan for complete sovereignty, involving an abandonment of English suzerainty over them, and in 1884, as a result of their efforts, a new convention was signed by Lord Derby on the part of England, by which the South African Republic was granted full recognition. The British resident was withdrawn from Pretoria and a council appointed. In 1885 a new element of discord escaped from the Pandora box of Boer destiny. Gold was discovered. The richest and most remarkable mines in the world were exposed to British cupidity. They were apparently inexhaustible, yielding an even average of gold to each and every ton of ore. As a result of this discovery immigration poured into the Transvaal from all parts of the world. England, Russia, France, Germany, the United States, and Canada sent their quotas of fortune seekers, and many of them were mere adventurers. They invaded the Boer domain, not to found homes and transport their families thither, but to wrest wealth from the soil and send their gains to distant climes.

The Boers soon realized that the newcomers, gathered from every quarter of the globe, would some day outnumber them, and, by the force of numbers, take control of their government and turn their country over to some foreign power. And thus their freedom, so long sought amid dangers and suffering, and for which they had sacrificed so much, would be taken away forever. There were two preventive courses, either of which they had a perfect right to adopt. One was to forbid the opening of more mines, and the other was to limit the franchise and extend the time of residence required before an alien could secure citizenship. The latter course was pursued, and the length of residence required to entitle an immigrant to citizenship was extended to fourteen years.

England was determined, in pursuance of her historic habit, to possess herself of the Transvaal gold fields. Cecil Rhodes, the president of the South African Chartered Company, and at that time prime minister of Cape Colony, who had made many millions out of diamond mines at Kimberley, devised a plan for the consummation of England's scheme of greed. His plan involved a rebellion on the part of the English residents of Johannesburg and the overthrow of the Dutch government. In pursuance of this plan arms were secreted in the city. Dr. Jameson, administrator of the territories of the South African Company, who had at his disposal a body of mounted police, was brought into the conspiracy and a day fixed for an uprising. On that day Dr. Jameson was to march in with his raiders and assist in accomplishing the overthrow of the Dutch Republic. For some reason the Uitlanders changed the date of the demonstration; but Dr. Jameson, impatient over the delay and believing that his allies in Johannesburg would fly to arms on the appearance of his force, determined to spring the plot. So, late in December, 1895, with a force of about 800 men, he entered the Transvaal and advanced toward Johannesburg.

The Boers had been warned, and Jameson was soon surrounded and compelled to surrender.

Jameson's force consisted of 512 well-mounted men and a strong quota of artillery, including 8 Maxim guns. The Boers had not over 700 men, and only 50 were at any time actually engaged. The last charge of the English was met and overcome by 7 Boers. Jameson lost 50 men and the Boers 4. On every previous occasion and on each subsequent occasion the British have failed utterly to prevail over the untrained citizen-soldiers of the Dutch Republic.

It is believed, and I believe, that the British foreign office had full knowledge of the contemplated raid and approved it. The affair exhibited all the marks of identification of the time-honored English method as described by Morley, a method that provokes resistance and then assumes that the Queen's forces have been attacked. But in this case the overthrow of Dr. Jameson was so sudden and so complete, and his operation so barefaced, infamous, and unjust, that even the English Government did not dare defend the raid or follow it up, although no one was punished for participating in it.

Jameson's revolutionary act caused great indignation among the Dutch of all South Africa and unified them in a determination to resist English aggression. It convinced the most conservative among the inhabitants that there was no limit to English perfidy and English dishonor. The Boers began at once to arm themselves and to fortify and to organize and drill all men between 16 and 60 years of age. Pretoria was fortified and works were constructed to command Johannesburg. Guns and ammunition were bought in Europe, and the miners were taxed to pay for these weapons of war. A treaty was made with the Orange Free State, offensive and defensive.

Members of the English Parliament have said recently that Kruger began his armament before the Jameson raid, with a view to driving the English out of South Africa entirely.

Mr. Drage, M. P., at Derby, December 7, 1899, said:

I charge conspiracy among the Dutch to overthrow English rule in South Africa. The armaments which have been accumulated for many years past, even before the Jameson raid, and the efficient drill and equipment of the Boers, alone showed what their ambitions have been.

The Boers have for nearly eighteen years been accumulating artillery, rifles, melinite, German and Hollander officers with which to oust England from South Africa.

This statement is untrue, but it illustrates the English method of falsehood to justify crime.

In 1895, just before the Jameson raid, Cecil Rhodes sent Major White to Pretoria to see what arms Kruger had, in order to judge what force to send to make the raid successful.

White's diary was afterwards found with a memorandum of the guns he found at Pretoria.

1. One half dozen very old pieces of ordnance.
2. One bronze gun of the date of the Second Empire.
3. A broken Maxim Nordenfelt.
4. A small muzzle-loader in bad condition.

Three Maxims and six other guns.

He says:

None of the guns I saw were fit for much work.

Captain Young visited Pretoria for the Times early in 1896, just after the Jameson raid, and he reports:

Orders for batteries of field guns, quick-firing guns, and Maxims, and for sufficient rifles to arm every Dutchman in South Africa were being sent to Europe; European drill inspectors were being imported and forts were being constructed around Pretoria on the most improved designs. One attempt had been made to take their country from them: they were thoroughly convinced that the attempt would be renewed at some future date, so the Boers were determined to be thoroughly on their guard the second time.

For 1892 the military expenditures of the Transvaal were $150,000, and for 1893 they were less than $100,000. In 1894 they were less than $150,000. In 1895, the year of the raid—and there were rumors of the raid for weeks before it occurred—the military expenditures were $435,000, and in 1896 the expenditures were $2,500,000.

The St. James Gazette of the 29th of August, 1899, says that in September, 1895, President Kruger asked why the Chartered Company was buying hundreds of horses for presentation to the new Volunteer Rhodesian Horse.

The truth is that the Boers armed only for defense, and after the Jameson raid, and they have continued to arm ever since. They had good reason to prepare for protection, for they saw Chamberlain was still foreign secretary and had whitewashed Cecil Rhodes in Parliament, and England treated Jameson and his raiders as the heroes of the Empire.

Proof is abundant that English spies have been engaged in mapping all the roads, rivers, and defenses in both the Transvaal and the Orange Free State for the past two years. In 1899 England determined to make another effort to secure the gold mines, for their richness had been further demonstrated by the production of over $80,000,000 in one year.

To accomplish this covetous design excuses must be produced for a quarrel. The English papers began to publish daily editorials rehearsing alleged wrongs perpetrated upon her subjects in the Transvaal. It was said they were taxed without representation, and a demand was made that the time required by the Dutch law to acquire the right to vote for members of both houses should be reduced to five years.

These assertions were formulated by Chamberlain, the minister for the colonies, and presented by the British representative at Pretoria, and then the British Government, for the first time in its history, presented the curious spectacle of one government endeavoring to compel another government to make it easy for her English citizens to renounce their allegiance to the Queen.

After negotiations had continued for several months, the government of the Transvaal surrendered to all the demands of the English, and sent the following communication to Mr. Chamberlain, through the English representative at Pretoria, who said there was no doubt it would be accepted:

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS, GOVERNMENT OFFICE,
Pretoria, August 19, 1899.

SIR: With reference to your request for a joint inquiry, contained in your dispatches of August 2 and 3, the Government of the South African Republic have the honor to suggest the alternative proposal for the consideration of Her Majesty's Government, which this Government trusts may lead to final settlement.

1. The Government are willing to recommend to the Volksraad and the people a five years' retrospective franchise, as proposed by his excellency the high commissioner at Bloemfontein on June 1, 1899.

2. The Government are further willing to recommend to the Volksraad that 8 new seats in the First Volksraad and, if necessary, also in the Second Volksraad be given to the population of the Witwatersrand, thus, with the 2 sitting members of the gold fields, giving to the population thereof 10 representatives in a Raad of 36, and in the future the representation of the gold fields of this Republic shall not fall below the proportion of one-fourth of the total.

3. The new burghers shall, equally with the old burghers, be entitled to vote at the election for State President and commandant-general.

4. The Government will always be prepared to take into consideration such friendly suggestions regarding the details of the franchise law as Her Majesty's Government, through the British agent, may wish to convey to it.

5. In putting forward the above proposals the Government of the South African Republic assumes:

(a) That Her British Majesty's Government will agree that the present intervention shall not form a precedent for future similar action, and that in the future no interference in the internal affairs of the Republic will take place.

(b) That Her Majesty's Government will not further insist on the assertion of the suzerainty, the controversy on this subject being allowed tacitly to drop.

(c) That arbitration (from which foreign element other than Orange Free State is to be excluded) will be conceded as soon as the franchise scheme has become law.

The Government trusts that Her Majesty's Government will clearly understand that in the opinion of this Government the existing franchise law of this Republic is both fair and liberal to the new population, and that the consideration which induces them to go further, as they do in the above proposals, is their strong desire to get the controversies between the two Governments settled; and, further, to put an end to the present strained relations between the two Governments and the incalculable harm and loss it has already occasioned in South Africa, and to prevent a racial war, from the effects of which South Africa may not recover for many generations, perhaps never at all.

Mr. Chamberlain rejected the reasonable proposals, and, instead of coming to a fair understanding, he increased his demands. The Boers were disheartened and grieved. Consequently the South African Republic withdrew its proposals and asked Her Majesty's Government to stand by the original ones.

Mr. Chamberlain replied by breaking off negotiations in the form of an ultimatum, saying:

The Imperial Government are now compelled to consider the situation afresh and formulate proposals for a final settlement of the issues which have been created in South Africa by the policy constantly followed for many years by the Government of the South African Republic (the Transvaal).

They will communicate the result of their deliberation in a later dispatch.

It was then September 22. The promised proposals were not forthcoming. The efforts of Mr. Green, the consular agent in Pretoria, were in vain. In the meantime and previous to these negotiations war preparations were going on, and a cry for war was heard in the English Parliament. To gain time was the scheme for the present until the British Government had a sufficient army landed, so as to dictate terms. The Boers waited until October, and then sent an ultimatum demanding that no more troops be sent to Africa pending negotiations and offering to arbitrate.

Mr. Chamberlain now replied that the Dutch were not an independent nation and that they were in revolt against their sovereign, the Queen of England. This was a position Mr. Chamberlain could not sustain, for after the Jameson raid, when he was criticised in Parliament, on May 20, 1896, he made the following statement:

In some quarters the idea is put forward that the Government ought to have issued an ultimatum, which would have certainly been rejected and which must have led to war. Sir, I do not propose to discuss such a contingency as that. A war in South Africa would be one of the most serious wars that could possibly be waged. It would be in the nature of a civil war. It would be a long war, a bitter war, and a costly war. It would leave behind it the embers of a strife, which I believe generations would hardly be long enough to extinguish. To go to war with President Kruger in order to force upon him reforms in the internal affairs of his State, in which secretaries of state, standing in this place, have repudiated all right of interference—that would be a course of action as immoral as it would have been unwise.

That declaration bears great similarity to the talk of our President when he announced that forcible annexation would be criminal aggression.

It is very appropriate that, as we should be trying to destroy a republic in partnership with England, the President's own words and Chamberlain's own words are sufficient to expose the duplicity of both.

In February, 1896, in a speech, Mr. Chamberlain made the following statement:

The answer which has hitherto been given, not on the part of the Transvaal, but on the part of some of its friends, was that to grant this request was to commit suicide, inasmuch as the moment the majority got the franchise the first use they would make of it would be to turn out the existing Government of the Transvaal and substitute a government of their own liking. [Hear! Hear! and laughter.] I confess I thought there was some reason in that objection. It is difficult to attempt to persuade anyone so capable as President Kruger that it would be desirable that he should proceed to his own extinction, and accordingly I brought before him an alternative suggestion, which, at all events, would relieve him from that difficulty. The question is whether President Kruger will consider that that proposal will endanger the security of the Transvaal Government. If he does, he will be perfectly justified in rejecting it.

James Bryce, M. P., in the North American Review, December, 1899, says:

Under the convention of 1884, which fixed the relations of Britain and the South African Republic, the latter had the most complete control of its internal affairs, and Britain possessed no more general right of interfering with those affairs than with the affairs of Belgium or Portugal. The suzerainty which has been claimed for her, if it existed (for its existence under the convention of 1884 is disputed), related solely to the power of making treaties and did not touch any domestic matter.

That which caused the war was the discussion of another matter altogether, which was admittedly not a grievance for the redress of which Britain had any right to interfere, and which therefore could not possibly amount to a casus belli. This matter was the length of time which should elapse before the new immigrants into the Transvaal could be admitted to citizenship, a matter entirely within the control of the Transvaal legislature.

It is the story of the diamond mines over again, with this exception: The Transvaal after the Jameson raid began to buy arms, and has become an arsenal of modern war equipment. Paul Kruger announced to the nations of the earth that, if they must surrender their liberties, England would pay a price in human life that would stagger humanity.

But was there oppression in the Dutch Republic, of the uitlanders or miners, as they are called?

Thael says, on page 350 in his work on South Africa:

The great majority of the people engaged in the mining industry are English speaking, while the farming population is Dutch. The intercourse between them is, upon the whole, friendly, and each section certainly exercises considerable influence upon the other. In the legislature, however, the English-speaking section is almost powerless, and taxation is arranged so as to fall lightly upon agriculture. In other respects no one has anything to complain of.

Andrew Carnegie, in the North American Review for December, 1899, says:

In the Transvaal there was scarcely any people but the Dutch until the discovery of the mines, which have attracted foreigners from all nations, until to-day, by counting all foreigners as British, there may be a small majority against the Dutch; but these are not all British. Some estimate that there are not more than 6,000 British among the miners. Those of all other nationalities do not side with the British as against the Dutch. The vast majority of these, as well as of the British, are opposed to the present attack upon the Transvaal. Of this there can be no doubt. The people are working the mines, receiving enormous wages and only wish to be let alone. They do not wish to become burghers in order to vote; especially is this true of the British. I have peculiar means of knowing this. Several of the tenants upon my Skibo estates have sons or brothers in the mines, and I have from time to time been informed of the letters which they write home. There is one now in charge of an important mine whose letters are most significant. He stated to his father in one of these what I have already said, and that the Britons liked the Boers and did not wish to become burghers. They were there as Britons to make money and finally to return to their homes. They wanted no franchise. He stated that the petition to Her Majesty praying her to interfere was not generally signed by the Britons, and that many of the foreigners signed the petition believing it had reference to some dreaded temperance legislation in which they were deeply concerned.

H. A. Rose, formerly superintendent of the Homestake mine, in South Dakota, now engaged in mining in the Transvaal, writes a friend at Deadwood that the sympathies of most American miners there are with the Boers, and that many of them will fight in the ranks of the Dutch army. The miners are of the opinion that if the British conquer and get possession of the gold mines, which are the richest in the world, the miners' wages will at once be reduced.

William Adan, who left Sioux Falls, which is my home, some years ago for South Africa, writes that he left Johannesburg just three days before hostilities between England and the Boers commenced. He says that the war was uncalled for and that the so-called injustice of the Boer laws was greatly exaggerated by the British press. The Boers, he says, are a very temperate class of people, and the foreigner who behaved himself and acted like a man was respected by them and had no more trouble than in any other civilized community in the world.

Froude thus describes the Boers in his book Oceana, on page 42:

The Boer, as we call him, is a slow, good-humored person, not given to politics, occupied much with his religion and his private affairs.

The Boers of South Africa, of all human beings now on this planet, correspond nearest to Horace's description of the Roman peasant soldiers who defeated Pyrrhus and Hannibal. There alone you will find obedience to parents as strict as among the ancient Sabines, the severa mater whose sons fetch and carry at her bidding, who, when those sons go to fight for their country, will hand their rifles to them and bid them return with their arms in their hands or else not return at all.

They arrange their disputes with the natives with little fighting.

In the Transvaal a million natives live peaceably in the midst of them, working with them and for them. There has been no uprising of the blacks against whites in the Transvaal.

I have presented this evidence to show who the Boers are. Now, who are the Uitlanders? They all, or nearly all, live in Johannesburg, which is a city of 108,000 people, 28,000 women and 80,000 men. The whites number 60,000 and the blacks 43,000. There are 5,000 Chinese. Very few white women live in Johannesburg, and nearly all who are there are harlots. Chamberlain and the English Government pretend to the world that Great Britain was forced to go to war against the Boers to redress the wrongs of these unmarried men who are living there without family ties or social restraints, intending to remain only long enough to make their fortunes and then depart. These foreigners were not asking for the franchise, and now this young Republic is to be destroyed by England's mighty army because Paul Kruger would not turn his government over to this band of adventurers, to these men without families and the consorts of harlots.

Mr. President, it was not the alleged wrongs of the Uitlanders that caused the war. We must look for another reason. Any person familiar with English history for the past century will experience no trouble in reaching the cause.

I find the following in Reynolds's Newspaper, London:

1. The taxes in the Transvaal are levied on the rich and not on the poor. The Uitlander worker who earns from £5 to £10 a week is only taxed to the extent of 1½s. per annum.

2. Wages at the Kimberley mines, under Rhodes & Co. and the British Government, are less by one-half than those of the Transvaal mines.

The Johannesburg capitalists have declared in print that so soon as Britain has annexed the Transvaal wages will be lowered by 40 per cent.

3. In the Transvaal Sunday labor is prohibited, and the authorities fine any employer who permits it.

In Kimberley, under the British flag, the mines are kept going seven days a week.

4. In the Transvaal the working day for both black and white men is eight hours by law.

At Kimberley black men are worked for twelve hours a day.

5. In Kimberley what is called the "compound" system is in force for colored men. This is slavery by another name. The Government of the Transvaal Republic will not allow the system to be introduced into the Transvaal.

6. At the meeting of the South African Chartered Company the other day, Earl Grey said that our—the British—Government would support the company in the introduction of native (black) and Asiatic (yellow) "labor" because of its "cheapness" as compared with white or British "labor."

The real motive for the war against the Boers is founded in English greed, in English cupidity, and in English dishonor.

Labouchere, M. P., in his paper, the London Truth, of January 18, 1899, says:

The real fact, as every day is becoming more clear, is that Mr. Rhodes wished to reacquire power in the Cape in order to sell his chartered company to us with the aid and approval of the Cape Colony, and that the mine owners in the Transvaal wanted to convert its government into an organization to crimp blacks and to force them to work in the mines. Admitting that we had cause to complain of the treatment by the Transvaal of our citizens in not allowing them to make a sufficient number of blacks work for them, we ought to have consented to arbitration, as suggested by President Kruger. The only reason we did not was that any independent investigation would have blown to the winds the fabrications of the South African League and of the Transvaal mine owners which were circulated by Mr. Chamberlain in order to arouse the passions of Englishmen at home to war point.

Mr. Frederic Harrison, one of the foremost men of England, has to say about this question of the franchise in the Transvaal. In an open letter to Lord Salisbury, the premier of Great Britain, published in the London Chronicle August, 1899, Mr. Harrison said:

"Measured by the compromises with foreign nations which you may justly claim to have brought to a successful issue, the concessions already accepted by the Republic are indeed decisive. From nine years to seven years, from seven to five years, from one demand of the outlanders to another, the Boers have given way. They have already conceded the whole of the original demand made upon them and have even added more. And at every fresh concession Sir Alfred Milner is instructed to make further demands, until throughout the Transvaal, and we may well add at home, the impression prevails that it is not concession of claims which is sought from the Republic, but submission, humiliation, and loss of independence. Is this how negotiations have been carried on, when you, my lord, as head of the foreign office have dealt with Russia, Turkey, France, or the United States? This is not negotiation. It is war, war of naked aggression, war wherein the Boers will not yield without a desperate struggle and after bloody combats, a war which can not be closed by a few victories nor the traces of it wiped out by a few promises or proclamations, a war wherein many true and patriotic Englishmen devoutly trust that the Boers may not be ultimately crushed."

Mr. J. A. Hobson, in the London Speaker, asked "What are we fighting for?" And he then asserted that the mine owners in the Transvaal desired to overthrow the Republic so they could enact the same slave-labor laws in force at Kimberley; so that they could repeal the eight-hour law and compel the black laborers, at least, to work twelve hours a day; so that they could repeal the Sunday laws and run the mines seven days each week, as they do at Kimberley. Mr. Hobson says:

The attitude of the mining industry toward the Transvaal Government in respect of the labor question is instructive. Witnesses before the industrial commission at Johannesburg were unanimous in maintaining that it was the duty of the Government to procure a steady and sufficient supply of Kaffirs for the mines. The Government was called upon to accredit and assist agents of the mining industry to obtain native labor, to pay premiums to Kaffir chiefs, to furnish extra pay to the native commissioners for the same object, and to convey this labor "under supervision" to the mines, erecting "compounds" along the road, reducing railroad fares to one-third of the existing rate, and in a dozen other ways spending further money in serving the private interests of the mines. Why politics and economics are so closely connected that the public purse should be used to keep down the wages bill of the mines is not intelligible to English people. But it is perfectly clear that under a "reformed" government the mine owners will take every care to press these claims.

The testimony of Mr. Albu before the industrial commission at Johannesburg throws a great deal of light upon this feature of the case:

"The native at the present time receives a wage which is far in excess of the exigencies of his existence. The native earns between 50 shillings and 60 shillings per month, and then he pays nothing for food or lodging. In fact, he can save nearly all that he receives. If the native can save £30 a year, it is almost sufficient for him to go home and live on the fat of his land. In five or six years' time the native population will have saved enough money to make it unnecessary for them to work any more. The consequences of this will be most disastrous for the industry and the State. This question applies to any class of labor and in any country, whether it be in Africa, Europe, or America. I think if the native gets enough to save £5 a year, the sum is quite enough for his requirements and will prevent natives from becoming rich in a short space of time.

"You say the native does not require luxuries, and if he has worked for a year he has saved enough to go back to his kraal and remain idle?

"Yes.

"Can you suggest any remedy for this?

"The only remedy which I can suggest is that we pay the native a wage which, while enabling him to save money, will hinder him from becoming exceptionally rich.

"Is it in the control of the mining industry to regulate the wages of Kaffirs?

"To a great extent—that is, if the Government assists us in bringing labor to this market."

Here, Mr. President, is the gist of the whole controversy. If the English Government conquer the Transvaal, they will take those people, as they did at Kimberley, to assist in bringing labor to the market. In fact, to-day there are four English colonies where the contract-labor system is in force—Jamaica, British Guiana, Mauritius, and Trinidad. There a system of slave labor exists enforced by the British Government, the laborers being imported under contract and driven to toil by their slave masters, punished if they are idle, fined, and compelled to have the hours which they shall toil regulated by the labor contractor; and an English writer announces to-day that this is the proper system for labor in the Tropics; that no matter what country holds colonies in the Tropics, the labor system adopted by the English at Kimberley, in British Guiana, in Jamaica, and in Trinidad is the system for the best interests of the laborer and of the employer.

Mr. Hobson says:

If this war can be successfully accomplished and a settlement satisfactory to the mine owners can be reached, the first fruits of victory will be represented in a large, cheap, submissive supply of black and white labor, attended by such other economies of cost as will add millions per annum to the profits of the mines.

The blood and the money of the people of Great Britain are being spent for this purpose. No other definite, tangible result of the conflict can be shown. The men who, owning the South African press and its political organizations, engineered the agitation which has issued in this war are the same men whose pockets will swell with this increase. Open-eyed and persistent, they have pursued their course, plunging South Africa into a temporary ruin in order that they may emerge victorious, a small confederacy of international mine owners and speculators, holding the treasures of South Africa in the hollow of their hands.

Any person who will examine this disgraceful chapter of English history will find that the more closely it is looked into, the more shocking it becomes, and he will be led to marvel that the world looks on while the infamy is being accomplished.

The argument employed to silence the consciences of the small number of English people who are possessed of that moral faculty is that they propose to confer the blessings of English rule upon these people.

Is English rule such a blessing?

In India to-day 75,000,000 of enforced British subjects are starving, and Moreton Frewen, a prominent English writer, with an estate in Ireland, says the chief cause of this condition was the closing of the India mints to silver coinage, thus destroying the value of the savings of these people, which were in silver ornaments and bullion. We may add to this cause the vast sums taken annually from India by taxation to support a foreign army and a great foreign pension list.

Before English occupation a native farmer could not be deprived of his title to his land. No matter how deeply he might become involved in debt, the title to his home was sacred and could not be taken away. England changed the law and allowed the title to pass by foreclosure or by judgment for debt, and the result has been the same as it has been in every other place where similar practices exist—the usurers are acquiring vast estates, the independent land owners are becoming tenants and hence slaves, forced to take what is left of the product of their toil after their landlords are satisfied. These causes, all the result of English rule, have produced starvation in India every year, and in bad years, like the present, people die by millions. What is given in compensation for this horrid condition? The people of India have not adopted anything that is English. They are not Christians. They can not speak the language of their conquerors. In fact, England has never tried to Christianize them or teach them the English language. England's only incentive to the improvement of the Indian has been, how much money can our favored classes make out of India by exploiting the country for franchises and by taxation?

Mr. MASON. I would not interrupt the Senator but for the fact that he is just leaving the question as to the cause of the famine in India; and I wish to ask him, is it not also true that one of the principal causes of that famine is that the cereals of India which the natives raise are exported and taken away to England—that the very food they themselves raise is taken away from them?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Oh, yes, Mr. President. I say that, added to the fact that silver has been demonetized in India, comes the shipping away of vast sums to feed the British army and an enormous civil pension list. The food supply of India to the amount of $150,000,000 a year is shipped away and sold for the purpose of paying a vast army of pensioners in England who have been engaged in the Indian service—either the civil or the military service. The balance of trade is in favor of India $150,000,000 each year, but no money goes to India to square the account. It is squared by the pretended philanthropic services of the English civil service and the English army, who are there simply to advance the interests of English capital.

Mr. MASON. There are more people starving in India than the English are losing in the South African war.

Mr. PETTIGREW. There are fifty-odd million people in India to-day who are starving. In fact, 80 out of every 100 of the people of India never have enough to eat. Some few of the people have plenty of food, and 4 out of each hundred live in luxury. That is the effect of caste in India, and we are approaching the same condition of things in this country. It has been accomplished in India by ages of progression, but is being accomplished in this country by a few years of a different system.

Mr. GALLINGER. There is plenty to eat in this country.

Mr. PETTIGREW. The Senator from New Hampshire says he has plenty to eat.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. PETTIGREW. I am very glad of that, but I presume there are people in New Hampshire who do not, as a rule, have plenty to eat, and there are some in all our great cities.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit, I did not say what he represents me as saying. I said our people were getting plenty to eat.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Well, I suppose the Senator is one of the people.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think the Senator's statement is hardly borne out by the facts, and I trust the Senator, at least, is not in that category.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, the coal miner in Ohio in 1898 received $192 for his yearly wage; and, with a family of five, that would leave $39 per capita to furnish a home, education, food, and raiment for an American citizen and his family. Last year the coal miner in Ohio received $241 for his yearly wage; which was about $48 per capita to feed, to clothe, to educate, and to house his family. Whether they had enough to eat or not I have not investigated. I presume they would have been glad to have had more and better food than they could buy with such a wage. Further than that, the wages of the Ohio coal miner were less last year and the year before than were the wages of miners in Austria.

I have previously described Johannesburg, in the Transvaal.

It is a typical English foreign settlement.

There are two other English colonies to which I will call your attention—Singapore and Hongkong. The latter is a city of 222,000 people (1891 census). The white population is 8,550, of whom 6,468 are males and 2,085 are females. The Asiatics number 151,100 males and 61,800 females. There are therefore 3 white males to 1 female, and almost three colored males to each female. Even the Asiatics recognize the character of the settlement.

In Singapore there are 184,500 people, 4,312 of whom are white males and 942 white females. There are 135,000 Asiatic males and 40,500 Asiatic females. The white males outnumber the white females more than 4 to 1, and the Asiatic males outnumber the Asiatic females more than 3½ to 1. In both of the typical English colonies even the Asiatics will not live with their families because of the vile character of the settlements. These colonies are little better than brothels, and these Englishmen are there only for purposes of trade. Their golden rule is to keep all they get and get all they can, as the first and the last and the whole duty of man, and the thought of benefiting the people over whom they rule never enters into their calculations.

The person would be simple indeed who believed these soulless adventurers were there to teach or practice the golden rule. Yet Kipling says they are there to "bear the white man's burden." At Singapore benevolent assimilation has done its work and has left impress upon the morals of the people.

The Statesman's Year-Book says that in Singapore there are 3,600 Eurasians. I looked to see what a Eurasian was and I found it was a person born of a European father and an Asiatic mother, and through further investigation I learned that not one in twenty was born in lawful wedlock.

The English army and the English police protect property and trade in these colonies, and that is the only boast England can lay claim to wherever her infamous heel has poisoned the earth.

England must rise or fall in her boast of power to govern others and confer the benefits of a Christian civilization upon them by the success or failure of her effort in India; by the success or failure of her effort in Singapore; by the success or failure of her effort in Hongkong, in Jamaica, in Trinidad, in fact, wherever she has planted her flag; and I defy any person to find a colony under English rule, not composed of Englishmen, where they have not been miserably cursed by her presence.

Nothing that is good, nothing that is beneficial, nothing that is of advantage to those people has been conferred by England's presence, until to-day she is hated wherever she is, and it would be a blessing to mankind if she were driven from those countries.

Mr. President, there are many noble Englishmen—Mathew Arnold, John Stuart Mill, John Morley, James Bryce are examples which would honor any land or any race; but these men have no influence and exercise no force in shaping the political and industrial elements that control the English Government. The governing classes of England are governed by but one motive—greed—and to satisfy greed they engage in plunder. They have no higher aim than that which rules the highwayman. They hate and despise all other nations and all other races of men. If they bestow the flattery of friendship upon any nation or any man, it is to enable them to use the intended victim of their mercenary attentions. They scheme to reap an advantage by a pretense of friendship. That is the pretense they are tryng to play upon the people of the United States to-day, and I am sorry that they have found a foothold with a so-called American Administration.

Through all time, with what brutal contempt they have looked down upon and despised the Irish people. Just now they find it to their advantage to extol Irish bravery. You may travel around the world and make it a point to associate with the English residents and travelers in every country, and you will find that, which I have found, to be the fact.

In this connection I quote from a letter written by a graduate of Harvard College, who has been in almost every country upon the globe. He says:

> I was brought up in an atmosphere of great admiration for England—

If he was brought up in Massachusetts, that is pretty hard on Massachusetts—> and I was an ardent admirer of Great Britain, but after I have traveled in almost every country of Europe and Asia, and met the Briton home and abroad, I came to know that in Germany the British spent their time cursing the Germans. In France they cursed the French. In their own colonies they curse the natives. In Japan they loathe and despise the Japanese. In China no words are too strong to express the British contempt for the average Chinaman. In India they kick and cuff and swear at the natives of India. By mere contact with the British race I have got so I can scarcely speak of them without intense prejudice. I believe that the average Briton, unless you entirely sympathize with him in his prejudices, is the most prejudiced and meanest man in the world. He will have nothing to do with you unless you swing in line with his prejudices.

He must be exceedingly gratified with the present condition of this country, for the Englishman writes our treaties; and when we amend them, they are submitted to him to ascertain whether or not he is willing to accept the amendment previous to our action. I will quote further from this letter of my friend:

> As for the boasted freedom of the English courts, from actual experience I think it is all humbug. The British courts are settled in injustice. I had rather be tried by a German or even a Russian court than by an English court. I saw a woman tried in an English court in one of the countries of Asia, and it was utterly shocking to me to see what that woman had to endure. She was charged with having given poison to her husband. I believe her to be innocent to-day, yet the whole community had not a single Englishman who did not vent his British prejudice against this poor woman.
> She was sentenced to death, but the sentence was commuted to life imprisonment, and there it will end. I don't believe that the British Government, in its most generous mood, ever mitigated a sentence beyond life imprisonment when it concerned a woman. I should judge that there was solid satisfaction in the whole of England whenever a woman was condemned by the court. Of course the ultimate quality of an Englishman is hypocrisy. Wherever he goes he criticises from his peculiarly hypocritical point of view. If he goes to a French colony, he has unlimited sympathy for the natives who are crushed by the French Government. But if he goes to an English colony, he loathes and despises the natives. I have read in a number of books where Englishmen have traveled in the colonies of foreign nations. Never once have I seen the slightest evidence of fair judgment toward the governing power. It is only the English who understand liberty, and yet they are the most utterly illiberal people toward others in their mode of government on the face of the earth. God help those who are under British rule!

The English Government is organized to promote the getting of property, no matter who produced the property, and to the protection of that property after it has passed into English hands.

This force moves England's navies and sends her armies into distant lands to murder and to rob the weaker nation of its share of the earth.

The rights of man have no place in England's moral or legal lexicon. This is true to such an extent that even in England her courts punish for offenses against property ten times more severely than for offenses against the person. For years London Truth has published in parallel columns the punishments administered for petty thefts and trespass and for brutal assaults, in order to try and correct this abuse, but to no purpose, for English thought has been directed so long to the idea that property is sacred above all things and that the things man produces are more important than the man, that only a revolution in English sentiment can work the needed change; and that revolution can and will come only when the English Empire is dismembered and destroyed, and from its embers shall arise the new Englishman, believing in the rights of his fellow-men in place of the long-existing belief that no people have rights an Englishman is bound to respect.

During the reign of Victoria England has evicted from their homes in Ireland 3,668,000 Irishmen, and 4,185,000 Irishmen have left Ireland and gone to seek homes elsewhere, while during this reign over 1,200,000 people have died of starvation in Ireland. Yet in the midst of the most acute famine experiences vast quantities of food produced in Ireland were shipped to England to appease the appetites of English landlords, while the men, women, and children whose labor produced the food in Ireland died of starvation for the want of what their toil had earned, and the same thing is seen every year in India and is intensified to-day. Irish evictions were always made in the Queen's name. Gladstone said in Parliament: "We are particeps criminis. We with power in our hands look on." Taxation in Ireland to-day is very much higher than it is in England. Moreton Frewen, who is an English landlord with an estate in Ireland, is my authority for this statement.

Mr. President, I hope the day will come, and I hope the Transvaal war will furnish the opportunity, when Ireland will rise in her might and drive every English soldier into the sea and every English landlord from her soil. That island belongs to the people who till it. Confiscation of the rights of the nonresident landlord would be eminently justified in their case.

But how fares it with India? In the reign of the present monarch over 12,000,000 people have perished from starvation, and this year, the worst of all, that number is likely to be exceeded, as efforts for relief are almost suspended while the English nation spends its money and sheds the blood of its people in an effort to steal the Transvaal gold mines, so that her overrich may reap greater profit and employ slave labor to work the mines. But the opium trade flourishes and is profitable, for that is a government monopoly in India, and over the factories the English flag floats, and upon every package of the deadly drug is the stamp of Victoria and her coat of arms.

During the reign of Victoria, England has been engaged in forty wars, and in every one she was the aggressor. These have been wars of conquest and of plunder. During all this bloody and terrible reign the sun has arisen each morning to be greeted in its course around the world by the shrieks of her victims and the sound of English guns employed to murder those who resisted her oppression and gave up their lives in the vain effort to stay the course of English greed.

But the reflex influences of this half century of wrong to others have worked the ruin of the English race at home. One-tenth of her people are paupers; 66 per cent are without property and do not own the shelter over their heads or one foot of the earth on which they live.

Her yeomanry of the last century have disappeared forever. The lands they tilled are in pastures and in parks.

For the first time in history the English troops were beaten in and turned back by the people of central Asia in 1897.

Soldiers are not bred in the slums of cities; they are not recruited from the families of paupers; and if it were not for the contingent furnished by Ireland and Scotland and the recruits from the farms of Canada and Australia, the English armies in South Africa would long ago have been driven into the sea. The English soldier from England will no longer fight. Four hundred and fifty Boers attacked Spion Kop and killed and wounded 2,000 and drove those who were left to their defenses. The same story, wherever England has met white men for years, has been told. Fighting naked savages has become her business, the only business at which she is successful; and yet this work is the white man's burden, which we are asked to help bear.

England carries on these wars against the poorly armed people of Asia and Africa with the most cruel and savage barbarity. First the foe, often armed with old muzzle-loading rifles or spears, crowded together, without artillery, are mowed down by rapid-fire guns, and the survivors are demoralized. Then English mounted lancers charge the fleeing mass, overtaking individuals here and there and running them through the backs with their lances, keeping count of their victims and boasting of the number slain. Those left upon the field who are wounded are then murdered in cold blood. In the Soudan, in 1898, Kitchener fired upon crowds of women and children and killed hundreds at Omdurman.

Why is the lance longer used in modern warfare? Why are English horsemen armed with lances, the remotest relic of barbarism in connection with war? It is simply for the fun of what they called, when the war opened with the Boers, "pig-sticking." Is it not time that the civilized nations of the world rose and stayed the course of this nation which carries the black flag and is engaged in the murder of our fellow-men throughout the world?

Here is a picture of the Soudan campaign of 1896, from Winston Churchill, in the London Post, September 29, 1898:

> We had not gone far when individual dervishes began to walk toward the advancing squadrons, throwing down their weapons, holding up their hands, and imploring mercy. The laws of war do not admit the right of a beaten enemy to quarter.

The victor is not obliged to accept surrender. This is the new English doctrine of war. Churchill does not say what was done, but there is no doubt these supplicants for mercy were murdered on the spot.

Mr. E. N. Bennett, in the January Contemporary Review, related what he saw in the Soudan campaign:

> All the wounded were killed and then robbed.
>
> This slaughter of the wounded was not confined to Arab servants. It was stated that orders were given to kill the wounded. Certain it is no protest was made when scores of wounded were dispatched. The dervishes, who were stretched on the sands within a few yards, were bayonetted. Arabs, who lay further out in the desert from the line of march and happened to move or turn over in their agony, were instantly pierced with bullets. On some occasions shots were fired into the bodies of wounded men at such close quarters that the smell of burning flesh was sickening.
> After the battle of Omdurman, Dervishes, who lay with shattered legs or arms, absolutely without weapons, were bayoneted and shot without mercy. Our own British soldiers took part in it. On the west slopes of Surgham I noticed a fine old Dervish, with a gray beard, who was disabled by a wound in his leg. About 8 yards from him was his son, a boy of 17, whose leg had also been lacerated by a bullet. Both were without arms, yet an Englishman stepped out of the ranks and drove his bayonet through the old man's chest. The old man begged in vain for mercy and clutched the soldier's bayonet, reddening his hands in his own blood in a vain attempt to prevent a second thrust. No effort was made by officers or men to prevent the murder, and the report was that General Kitchener had given orders to kill all wounded.

This is from an English correspondent, who relates what he saw with his own eyes:

> No attempt was made for two days to do anything for the wounded Dervishes.

Except to murder and rob them.

General Kitchener returned from these terrible scenes with the blood of thousands of murdered men, women, and children on his hands, and urged Christian England to forget his barbarity and subscribe a fund to build a college at Khartoum to teach Christianity and English civilization. I can imagine the children, whose fathers and mothers had been thus barbarously murdered, flocking in numbers to become students of a civilization and a religion that had deprived them of their parents—and the justification for all this was that their purpose was to benefit and bless mankind.

Hear the canting Salisbury, at a dinner of the Constitutional Club, London, December 16, 1898. Referring to the Soudan campaign, he said:

> The Empire is advancing and must advance. The great strength you have must be used unfalteringly, unsparingly, but still prudently, for the advancement of the interests of the Empire and for the benefit of mankind. That we have used the force intrusted to us not violently, not sentimentally, but with calm and courageous calculation for the advancement of the interests of the Empire and the benefits of the civilization of mankind.

The cargo of an English ship starting to the Tropics on a mission of civilization and Christian mercy is made up of an assortment of merchandise, among which may be found rum and opium, with the Queen's stamp upon them. There are Bibles, English harlots, and the missionary to go before and open the way for the introduction of the rest of the cargo, until a colony is built up like Singapore and Hongkong. No wonder, with these experiences fresh in their minds, that the Asiatics do not embrace Christianity.

Our imperialistic friends and the President favor taking tropical colonies and holding them, after the English model, on the plea of duty to mankind, and the President employs fine passages of hypocritical cant borrowed from England's long experience. We are told we should join England in her work and help bear the white man's burden. We are told that now is the moment when the destiny of Anglo-Saxon civilization hangs in the balance, and we must take up the burden and spread civilization and enlightenment and Christianity, after the English fashion, over that portion of the world not yet cursed by the blight of English presence; that England has been doing the work for a century, and now she falters and finds the burden too great to bear. Jealous rivals covet her empire and her dominions; that the great prize at stake for mankind is Anglo-Saxon dominion and lordship over the world; that dominion after the English fashion it is our duty to uphold; that it is God's work, and that He desires we should make England's struggle our own. And so imbued has the President become with this idea that he has pursued a course that has led the whole world to believe he has made at least a verbal alliance with Great Britain to render aid, if occasion requires. The effect of our attitude has been to prevent the nations of Europe from helping the South African republics.

Therefore our duty is plain. We should pass this resolution of sympathy with these struggling Republics. We should show the world that England can not rely upon us for support in any form. We should encourage and counsel with her enemies. We should show to the whole world that we condemn her course in South Africa.

I spurn an English alliance and English sympathy. I want nothing to do with that nation of robbers and murderers, unless it be to join the other nations of the earth in a notice to England that she must close her career of piracy, must pull down her black flag, and withdraw her armed forces from all her colonies and allow them to be free. Rather than join in this unholy work, called by that poet of blood "the white man's burden," let us emulate the example of our forefathers and be again the champions of all men struggling to be free, the example to the world, the proof to mankind that a nation of freemen can do right, can be just, can resist the temptation to conquer and oppress, and that we hate injustice. Let us exhibit the example of a government conceived in liberty and dedicated to the proposition that all governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed, and demonstrate that this Government, so conceived and so dedicated, a government of, for, and by the people, shall not perish from the earth.

CIVIL GOVERNMENT FOR ALASKA.

Mr. CARTER. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 3419) making further provision for a civil government for Alaska, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Montana? The Chair hears none.

Mr. QUARLES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. CARTER. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin for a moment.

PORT OF GREENBAY, WIS.

Mr. QUARLES. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 963) to extend the privileges of the seventh section of the act approved June 10, 1880, to the port of Greenbay, Wis. It is a very short bill and it is unanimously recommended by the committee. There will be no objection to it.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SPANISH AND AMERICAN CLAIMS COMMISSION AWARDS.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. CARTER. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 558) to make disposition of the increment and accretions upon the sums reserved by the Department of State from the fund received by the United States upon the account of the payment of the awards of the late Spanish and American Claims Commission, and to pay and distribute the same. The bill simply provides for the distribution of the balance of $14,000, and is reported favorably by the Committee on Foreign Relations. It is a short bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations with an amendment, to insert, after the word "Congress," in line 5, on page 2, the following:

And the sum of $14,485.50 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to enable the Secretary of State to carry out the provisions of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CIVIL GOVERNMENT FOR ALASKA.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3119) making further provision for a civil government for Alaska, and for other purposes.

Mr. CARTER. I am advised that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH] is detained from the Senate to-day by illness, and in consequence the amendment offered by him can not be proceeded with without some discourtesy to the absent Senator. I therefore suggest that it go over for the day and that other amendments contemplated or to be presented to the bill be now offered.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Montana to one point.

Mr. CARTER. Will the Senator from Nevada permit me for a moment?

Mr. STEWART. Certainly.

Mr. CARTER. Before proceeding, I desire to say that upon Monday next it is earnestly hoped the bill may be finally disposed of. I have heretofore taken occasion to urge upon the Senate the necessity of prompt action upon this bill. It is very voluminous, and yet it is exceedingly difficult to discern in what respect it can be limited in volume or extent.

This morning I received from the Attorney-General a letter in which he states:

I inclose herewith for your information a copy of a communication from Major Ray, commanding officer of the district of north Alaska, reviewing the situation as to civil government in that section.

The communication of Major Ray is very suggestive and instructive, and to the end that all points covered by it may become known to Senators I ask that it be read from the desk. It is a graphic picture of conditions existing in northern Alaska and the strongest kind of a plea for the passage of the bill which has been before the Senate for some time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

CIVIL GOVERNMENT IN NORTH ALASKA.

HEADQUARTERS DISTRICT OF NORTH ALASKA,
Fort Egbert, Alaska, December 31, 1899.

The ADJUTANT-GENERAL UNITED STATES ARMY,
Washington, D. C.
(Through Headquarters Department of the Columbia.)

SIR: With the close of the year I have the honor to report that the situation of north Alaska as to civil government remains unchanged. While at the last session of Congress a criminal code was established, no machinery was provided to properly enforce it. The United States district judge, who resides at Sitka, passed down the Yukon in August, but did not stop at any one place long enough to hold court or to hear cases over which his court only has jurisdiction.

He appointed several court commissioners and deputy United States marshals. Such commissioners having, under the law, the powers of a justice of the peace in criminal cases only, and being without money, jails, courthouses, or any means of conducting their courts, except on credit, they have been of but little service. The attainments of some of the appointees do not demand that respect that a representative of the United States judiciary should in a country like this.

In civil cases no court has been established, except at Sitka, that has jurisdiction, and there is no officer north of that point before whom a civil suit can be commenced.

The practical operation of this condition leaves all of north Alaska without any court to which the citizens can appeal, owing to the time and expense attending the process of bringing suit, and even the commissioner's court is too expensive a luxury to be indulged in except by the most opulent.

Where it is a question of title or ownership there is no court that has the power to issue an injunction or a restraining order pending action by the Sitka court. Consequently many serious complications are arising out of disputed title to placer mines, owing to the fact that the delay incident to filing information in the court at Sitka gives either party ample time to take from the ground all the valuable mineral before any action can be had in determining title by the court.

Where action in determining title by a miners' meeting I interfere to restrain until such time as both parties can get into court, but individual disputes I am unable to adjust. Crimes arising out of such disputes do and will occur, and are only incident to the conditions that exist here.

To me the most remarkable feature is the peaceable character of the population all along the Yukon Valley. In an experience of over thirty years along our frontier I have never seen so little crime in proportion to the population and the interests at stake. It will be a great misfortune if the present Congress does not give to this north country a well defined civil government, fully adequate to settle all questions that may arise, with judicial districts easily accessible to the people living in the interior. The people have just cause for complaint when a Government like ours forces any portion of its citizens to make a journey half around the world to get an appeal for justice, for, measured by the time and expense it takes to make the journey, it is farther, for nine months of the year, from here to Sitka than it is from Washington to the Philippines. The salaries paid to the officials now authorized is a mere pittance compared with the cost of living, and bars the securing of competent men unless they devote their time to their personal interests instead of their duties. This should be recognized, and such salaries paid that men of ability and integrity could afford to take the offices and refrain from becoming interested parties in the matters they may be called upon to adjudicate.

At Anvil City, I learn from an officer in command there that the citizens have organized a full municipal government, with the necessary constables and police to preserve the peace, with most satisfactory results; but here at Circle City and Rampart City no such action has been taken, which I am of the opinion is owing to the fact that the transient element so largely predominates. They are here solely for what they can make, and naturally defeat any attempt of the citizens who are here to stay to organize any government that the people must support by taxation. Knowing the country and the character of the people as I do, I am strongly of the opinion that it is not for the best interests of the country or the people now here or who may come in the near future to give the same form of Territorial government (except as to judiciary) to Alaska as that given to the Territories in the United States proper.

An election by the floating population for the local civil officers would be a farce. The real resident would not, as a rule, be elected. The majority, with their officers, would migrate with the first rush to a new discovery. The conditions demand strong, quick action for the criminal class, and a conservative, simple government until the period of extreme inflation and excitement has passed; and all officials should be of a class not dependent upon the popular suffrage for office. The vast resources of this region, now just becoming known, should not be further jeopardized by allowing the country to drift into a condition of anarchy. That an abnormal condition of affairs exists should be fully recognized and met by proper laws suited to this country and its interests, which are often the opposite that exist in the United States proper. One of the most important interests that requires legislation is that of placer mining.

Very respectfully,

P. H. RAY,
Major, Eighth Infantry, Commanding District.

Mr. CARTER. Major Ray, the writer of the letter which has just been read, has been on duty in the district of Alaska for wellnigh two years. He is an intelligent officer and an acute observer of conditions. It is fortunate, indeed, and a subject of congratulation that the bill now before the Senate, which was framed without consultation with that officer, practically meets every suggestion made by him from an independent point of view.

I have heretofore taken occasion to suggest that a large number of people would go into the gold regions of Alaska during the coming summer. I placed the number at 100,000. Persons unfamiliar with conditions have flippantly regarded the figures thus stated as extravagant and impossible. There are now between 30,000 and 40,000 residents in Alaska; probably 20,000 to 25,000 persons in the vicinity of Dawson City and in the district known as the District of British Columbia, in the Canadian country.

The miners will not go exclusively by steamer to Cape Nome and St. Michaels. It is a fact not generally known, but nevertheless a fact, that a railway has been constructed from Skagway, at the head of the Lynn Canal in American territory, across the mountain range to the head waters of the Yukon River. That railroad has been in operation for some time, and is being rapidly constructed down the Yukon River to a point near Dawson City. Over this line of railroad, connected with steamers that pass to and fro several times each week from Seattle, Portland, and other points on Puget Sound, passengers, prospectors, miners, and their supplies will find way into the district of Alaska, with a view to exploring the vast mineral deposits of the Yukon Valley.

The number of persons who will go to Cape Nome the coming summer will be limited only by the transportation facilities, and

I do not think it is at all extravagant to suggest that the laws we have in contemplation now embodied in this bill proposed to be enacted into law will apply during the coming summer to more than 100,000 residents or inhabitants of Alaska. The failure to pass the bill will, as Major Ray suggests, invite anarchy and confusion, which will be distressing to the unfortunate people there and a disgrace to the Congress of the United States.

In view of the necessity for prompt action upon this bill, if it is to be made a law at the pression session, I feel called upon now to say that upon Monday next, when the attendance of the Senate will be more full than at present, I shall ask unanimous consent for the fixing of an hour for a final vote upon the bill and all amendments pending at the hour agreed upon.

But two amendments remain to be seriously considered, one being the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH] and the other proposed by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BATE]. The amendment of the Senator from North Dakota refers to certain mining rules and regulations and the presentation of proofs—the raising of issues in the course of litigation.

The amendment of the Senator from Tennessee proposes the submission to a jury of contempt cases in certain instances. The amendment the Senator from Tennessee can explain, I assume, within the limits of an hour, and I do not think that the debate upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota can extend much beyond that limit.

So, when the proposition is made on Monday morning to take a vote at 4 o'clock on Monday, or at 4 o'clock Tuesday, if desired, upon the bill and all pending amendments, I trust that Senators will be prepared to propose such amendments as they have in contemplation, to the end that they may at that time assent to the fixing of an hour for a vote.

There is a matter of detail, Mr. President, which may be acted upon in the absence of the Senator from North Dakota. I suggest an amendment, which is one of detail, on page 325 of the bill, and which I will ask the Senate to pass upon: After the word "court," in line 10, section 47, that is at the bottom of the page, I move to insert what I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

The secretary of the district shall collect $5 for each certificate of appointment made under this chapter, and disburse the same as provided in section 32, Title I, chapter 1, of this act.

Mr. CARTER. The purpose of this amendment is to authorize the secretary of the district to collect a fee of $5 from each person appointed a commissioner of deeds in any State or Territory without the limits of Alaska. The section referred to, which controls disbursements, provides that a like sum shall be collected from each person appointed a notary public in the district of Alaska, and the sum thus collected shall be used as a library fund for the district, the object being to lay the foundation for a historical library for the district of Alaska. The section provides for the collection of such curios as may be of historical interest, and the collection of such books and periodicals as may have been or may hereafter be published in the district, and such other matter as may to the governor and Secretary of the Interior appear appropriate for collection in a historical library. This amendment would add a small amount to the sum thus provided, which in the aggregate would not exceed $1,200.

The PRESIDENT protempore. The amendment will be agreed to without objection. It is agreed to.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Montana to the amendment that was proposed to section 26, page 23. I think that some of the provisions of that amendment were adopted without understanding the exact facts. I did not understand the full provision myself at the time, and I had not examined the report of the Secretary of War with regard to what he had done. It was supposed that he had made regulations, and I was laboring under that impression, in granting permits between high and low water where miners might work, and that he had granted permits which were working a monopoly. I find that that is not the case. The Secretary's order and his proceeding there were very proper and necessary. The applications which were made were applications for permits to mine below mean low tide in the ocean. Of course mining rules and regulations could not be applied, and before any person could afford to make the expenditure necessary to mine in the ocean he would have to have some space upon which to work. Besides, such persons would be liable to criminal prosecution, to arrest, and all that, for interfering with navigation, and it was not only right and proper, but necessary, that they should have a permit from the War Department to mine; that there should be some space designated to them so that they could make the investment.

I think perhaps there is only one criticism to be made. The order says mean low tide. I think it might be confined to low tide and satisfy everybody. But these permits are necessary and proper. I will state that the Senator from Washington [Mr. TURNER], who introduced the amendment, is not here. I called his attention to it this morning, and told him that the report from the Secretary of War made it entirely proper, and he appeared to concur with me. I think he has no objection to the amendment I shall now propose.

Then there is another matter that was in the law passed in 1898 with regard to homesteads which left a space between the homesteads and also provided for a roadway parallel with the coast. That was manifestly intended to apply to agricultural lands, but it is construed by some to apply to mineral lands and town sites. Everyone recognizes that that ought to be corrected. I have drawn a substitute for the amendment which was submitted by the Senator from Montana and adopted by the Senate, which I think will meet all the situation and will be satisfactory to everybody.

Provided further, That subject only to such general limitations as may be necessary to exempt navigation from artificial obstruction all land and shoal water above low tide on the shores, bays, and inlets of Bering Sea, within the jurisdiction of the United States, shall be subject to exploration for gold and other precious metals by citizens of the United States or persons who have legally declared their intention to become such, under such reasonable rules and regulations as the miners in organized districts may have heretofore made or may hereafter make governing the temporary possession thereof for exploration and mining purposes until otherwise provided by law: Provided further, That the rules and regulations established by the miners shall be in conformity with the mining laws of the United States, and all permits heretofore or hereafter granted authorizing any person or persons, corporation or company, to excavate or mine under any of the said waters are limited to lands below low tide: And provided further, That the reservation of a roadway 60 feet wide under the tenth section of the act of May 14, 1898, entitled "An act extending the homestead laws and providing for right of way for railroads in the district of Alaska, and for other purposes," shall not apply to mineral lands or town sites.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada will suspend one moment. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 2355) in relation to the suppression of insurrection in and to the government of the Philippine Islands, ceded by Spain to the United States by the treaty concluded at Paris on the 10th day of December, 1898.

Mr. STEWART. I will state that the amendment of the Senator from Montana has been passed upon, but I ask that by unanimous consent it may be reconsidered, and I trust that the chairman of the committee will accept this substitute.

Mr. CARTER. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be laid aside without prejudice, to the end that we may proceed with the consideration of the Alaskan bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request made by the Senator from Montana? The Chair hears none.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Nevada——

Mr. STEWART. My amendment does not come in until I get consent to reconsider the other amendment which was adopted by the Senate. I want to offer this as a substitute. I ask unanimous consent that the amendment for which this is a substitute and which was adopted, to come in at the end of section 26, on page 23, be reconsidered, with a view to offer this as a substitute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada asks unanimous consent that the amendment heretofore agreed to on page 23 be reconsidered. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. STEWART. Now, I offer what I send to the desk as a substitute for that amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada offers an amendment as a substitute for the former amendment, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Provided further, That subject only to such general limitations as may be necessary to exempt navigation from artificial obstruction all land and shoal water above low tide on the shores, bays, and inlets of Bering Sea within the jurisdiction of the United States shall be subject to exploration for gold and other precious metals by citizens of the United States or persons who have legally declared their intention to become such under such reasonable rules and regulations as the miners in organized districts may have heretofore made or may hereafter make governing the temporary possession thereof for exploration and mining purposes until otherwise provided by law: Provided further, That the rules and regulations established by the miners shall be in conformity with the mining laws of the United States, and all permits heretofore or hereafter granted authorizing any person or persons, corporation or company to excavate or mine under any of the said waters are limited to lands below low tide: And provided further, That the reservation of a roadway 60 feet wide, under the tenth section of the act of May 14, 1898, entitled "An act extending the homestead laws and providing for right of way for railroads in the district of Alaska, and for other purposes," shall not apply to mineral lands or town sites.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the difference between this amendment and the amendment which was adopted on a former day goes to the merits of a controversy raised by the resolution of inquiry presented by the Senator from the State of Washington [Mr. TURNER]. That inquiry was directed to the Secretary of War, and required him to advise the Senate what, if any, permits had been granted to excavate along the shores of Bering Sea; and what, if any, rights or privileges had been granted in reference to the subject. The Secretary of War, in response to that resolution, replied that numerous applications had been made under a statute which he cited, and that certain permits had been granted, one to an individual in the State of Washington, another to an individual in the State of Ohio, and that others would be granted from time to time as formal application happened to be made.

In the case of the individual to whom a permit was granted in the State of Washington, it appeared by the appendix attached to the report of the Secretary that the right was given, which in itself constituted nothing more than an exemption from criminal prosecution, to the person named in the permit to excavate sand along the shore of Bering Sea near Cape Nome for a distance of 2 miles and a width of 500 feet extending out from low-tide line. Another permit was granted for a distance of 3 miles along the coast of the same width, to wit, 500 feet.

This report of the Secretary of War led to what seemed to me to be a line of unjust comments in this Chamber. It was claimed that he had no legal authority to grant the permit, to begin with. It was asserted that this granting of permits constituted a high-handed species of favoritism; that it gave to the individuals who possessed the permits special rights and privileges not granted to or intended to be granted to other persons. For a time the debate in the Chamber was of a stormy, vehement, and acrimonious character. It seemed from the statements made by Senators that the Secretary of War had been guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors in connection with the proceeding.

It was argued upon this side of the Chamber, and I believe is insisted still, that the action of the Secretary of War was regular, not extraordinary, not without authority of law, in conformity with a regularly established routine business regulation in the War Department, and in conformity with the provisions of a statute of the United States. Senators, however, on the other side of the Chamber continued to insist that it was a grave abuse of executive power; that no authority could be found in the statute for the granting of the permits, and that it should be stopped.

To the end that citizens of the United States might be permitted to get gold out of the sand along the shores of Bering Sea, if they could, the amendment which appears in the bill on page 23 was presented by me, and provided in substance that at any point in the shoal waters of Bering Sea citizens of the United States, or persons who had declared their intention to become citizens, under such rules and regulations as the miners themselves prescribe, not in conflict with the laws of the United States, might proceed to occupy, temporarily possess, and mine for gold or other precious metals along those shores to such an extent as would not interfere with navigation.

That is the amendment as it appeared in the bill when the request for unanimous consent was presented by the Senator from Nevada. Now the Senator proposes a substitute for that amendment.

Mr. SPOONER. On what page is that?

Mr. CARTER. At the bottom of page 23 the amendment came in, and the amendment as finally adopted will be found in the RECORD of March 27, on page 3575.

Mr. President, it is for the Senate to determine in passing upon the substitute proposed by the Senator from Nevada whether the contention of those who assailed the Secretary of War was well or ill founded. If Senators who charged the Secretary of War with transgressing or going beyond the limit of legal authority are willing to accept the view of the Senator from Nevada that a mistake was made in that behalf, I have no objection to offer, because I believed at the time, and I believe now, that the Secretary of War acted strictly within the limits of his legal authority, and that the method of procedure inaugurated by him was wise and entirely justified by the conditions.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President, will the Senator allow a question?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. PETTUS. Where is the law under which the Secretary of War had power to do that thing?

Mr. CARTER. The law is cited in the report of the Secretary of War in reply to the resolution. A copy of that report I will procure and have delivered to the Senator for his information.

Now, I am advised by the Senator from Nevada that the assault upon the Secretary of War was ill-timed, and that those who made the inquiry and severely commented upon the action of the Secretary of War, being advised of the error of their way, desire the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nevada to be incorporated in the bill.

That amendment in effect proposes that between low and high tide on the shores of Bering Sea and its inlets the miners of the district may make rules and regulations governing the location of claims, such rules and regulations not to be in conflict with the laws of the United States; and that below low-tide line the Secretary of War may continue, as heretofore, to issue permits to persons desiring to dredge in the sands and attempt to get the gold that is supposed to be lodged there.

Mr. BATE. Mr. President, this seems to be a very grave question and goes back over the ground we have once traveled, touching the right of the Secretary of War and his action in granting permits. I think that, as the amendment involves three or four points, it had better be printed and go over until Monday, when we will understand it more thoroughly. It ought to be printed and go over.

Mr. STEWART. I have no objection to that course. I want everybody to understand it.

Mr. BATE. I observe that Senators who participated in the debate here in regard to the right of the Secretary of War to grant those permits are not here, and perhaps they would like to be here when the matter is further considered.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to have the Senator from Washington [Mr. TURNER] here. I do not care about pressing my amendment in his absence.

Mr. BATE. I ask that the amendment be printed.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, I wish to offer an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Nevada, which I would like to have printed with that amendment. I do not know just where it will come in, but it follows the provision in regard to the roadway reservations.

Mr. STEWART. Let it come in at the end of my amendment.

Mr. BERRY. Very well; I think it will come in at the end of the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas offers an amendment to the amendment, which will be read, and then be printed and lie over.

Mr. BERRY. Yes; I ask that it be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

It being the intention hereof that locations upon or claims to land within said reservation shall have originated only after the passage and taking effect of this act.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Chair understand that the amendment accepted by the Senator from Montana is still before the Senate?

Mr. CARTER. As I understand the parliamentary situation, Mr. President, the Senate, by unanimous consent, reconsidered the vote whereby the amendment was adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes; and that leaves it before the Senate.

Mr. CARTER. That leaves the substitute before the Senate, which is the amendment presented by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY] would not be in order at this time, but it can be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. BERRY. Is the amendment of the Senator from Nevada an amendment to an amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. BERRY. Then I ask that my amendment be printed with that, and I will offer it hereafter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY] will be printed and lie on the table. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BATE] has asked that both amendments may go over until Monday. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it will be so ordered.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, since a number of Senators have entered the Chamber recently, I desire to renew the statement by me made at the opening of the discussion on the Alaska bill, that upon Monday morning I shall ask unanimous consent that a time be fixed for the final vote upon the bill and all amendments pending, at such time as may be agreed upon for the final vote. Meantime I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business, there being no further amendments of which I am advised.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator withhold that motion for a moment?

Mr. PETTUS. I hope the Senator from Montana will wait one moment before making that motion.

Mr. CARTER. I withdraw the motion at the request of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PETTUS].

Mr. PETTUS. I desire information from the President of the Senate; and that is, whether the amendment to which the substitute is proposed has been adopted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has not been adopted.

Mr. PETTUS. There has been nothing stricken out of the bill yet?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There has not been. Both the amendments and the subsequent amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY] have been ordered to be printed, and under request of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BATE] have gone over until Monday.

Mr. PETTUS. The Chair does not understand my question. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] made a motion to strike out and insert. Was that done?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was not. That is pending.

Mr. PETTUS. There is nothing struck out from the bill this morning?

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the Senator from Nevada [Mr.

STEWART] asks unanimous consent to reconsider the amendment which was inserted at the bottom of page 23 of the bill. That unanimous consent was given; whereupon he offered an amendment to be inserted at the same place, in lieu of the amendment previously adopted. No part of the bill was stricken out in connection with the proceedings.

Mr. BATE. I will say that the amendment is intended to be a substitute for section 26 as amended on the motion of the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER].

Mr. CARTER. It is to be added to section 26.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. At the request of the Senator from Tennessee, all the amendments will go over until Monday.

Mr. BATE. And be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. And be printed.

Mr. BACON. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Montana if this reconsideration relates to the amendment which is offered by the Senator himself and which was adopted by the Senate?

Mr. CARTER. That is correct.

Mr. BACON. And under the action of the Senate this morning that has been reconsidered.

Mr. CARTER. That has been reconsidered for the purpose of permitting the Senator from Nevada to present his amendment.

Mr. BACON. And if the amendment of the Senator from Nevada is not adopted, before the amendment previously adopted, which has been reconsidered this morning, can be of any avail it will have to be again adopted.

Mr. CARTER. It will have to be again adopted.

Mr. BACON. I desire to say that if I had known that, I think I would have objected, because that amendment was adopted after very full debate; and it does seem to me that there should have been some hesitation in receding from that amendment unless the mind of the Senate had been very carefully directed to it to show that it had committed an error when it did adopt the amendment.

Mr. BATE. I can not see but what the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada is a substitute for section 26; because if it is an amendment, it may be placed there as an amendment without affecting section 26 at all.

Mr. STEWART. I could have waited until we got into the Senate and then have offered it as a substitute, but I wanted to have the bill perfected before it went into the Senate.

Mr. BATE. Then it is a substitute for section 26?

Mr. STEWART. A substitute for the amendment to section 26.

Mr. BACON. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Montana, in order that I may be informed on the subject, whether he himself has ceased to desire the amendment which was previously adopted by the Senate at his instance?

Mr. CARTER. My position with reference to the action of the Secretary of War has not changed. I think the Secretary of War acted in a perfectly regular manner, but the amendment was presented for the purpose of meeting the objections made upon the floor of the Senate and to facilitate the passage of this bill. A certain line of comment was made upon the action of the Secretary of War, which seemed to me unjust and unwarranted by the facts; and yet the same purpose the Secretary of War had in view could be served in another way, which seemed more satisfactory to the Senate. The amendment which I presented seemed to embody the concurrent judgment of the Senate, and it was adopted. Now the Senator from Nevada says that Senators who made the assault upon the Secretary of War have changed their minds and ask the privilege of having his proposition considered.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I still have not received from the Senator from Montana the information which I desire. I listened with very great interest to the debate between himself and the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT], each of whom presented an amendment; and the question was a choice between the two. I was convinced by the very satisfactory argument of the Senator from Montana that his amendment was right; and I voted for it. Now, I desire to know whether the Senator himself is still in favor of that amendment, and as a matter of courtesy has consented to its temporary withdrawal in order that the Senator from Nevada may offer his amendment, or whether he still adheres to the amendment which he offered, and which he induced me as one to support by my vote.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the amendment of the Senator from Nevada does not essentially change the amendment presented by me. It limits its operation only to the point above mean low tide. The amendment as adopted by the Senate extends the rules and regulations of miners into the waters of the sea without any other limitation than the 3-mile limit, fixed by law for neutral waters.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. As to those who desire to operate below mean low tide, under what jurisdiction would they operate?

Mr. CARTER. Under the amendment of the Senator from Nevada, those who desire to operate under mean low tide would operate under permits from the Secretary of War.

Mr. SPOONER. Under the power which has been challenged here?

Mr. CARTER. Under the power which has been challenged here.

Mr. SPOONER. If there is a doubt about the existence of that power, ought it not to be distinctly conferred by this bill?

Mr. CARTER. I think the amendment of the Senator from Nevada would confer that power if any question existed with reference to its application.

Mr. SPOONER. I understood the Senator from Montana to say just now that the amendment of the Senator from Nevada did not apply to mining operations or explorations below mean low tide.

Mr. CARTER. The very opposite of that was what I said. I suggested that the amendment of the Senator from Nevada did not make any change in the operations of the amendment presented by me and adopted by the Senate, except beyond the line of low tide into the sea. The rules and regulations of the miners under the provisions of his amendment would be identical in application with the rules and regulations of miners under the amendment previously adopted by the Senate, but those rules and regulations would stop at low tide, and beyond that, according to the amendment of the Senator from Nevada, the jurisdiction of the Secretary of War would apply.

Mr. SPOONER. If it applies under existing law?

Mr. CARTER. Yes, if it applies under existing law.

Mr. SPOONER. But that jurisdiction is challenged by Senators on the other side of the Chamber.

Mr. CARTER. The policy of allowing the Secretary of War to interfere in any manner is challenged.

Mr. BACON. The Senator from Wisconsin is very much mistaken. The Senators on this side of the Chamber did not challenge it, and, if I remember correctly, had nothing to say. The question was between the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] and the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT], each of them offering a separate amendment antagonistic to the other—the Senator from Colorado contending that the matter should be under the control of the Secretary of War, and the Senator from Montana contending, on the contrary, that the miners' meetings should control; while the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PETTUS], a practical miner at one time in his life, gave his concurrence, or rather his consent, by his speech and vote to the substitute offered by the Senator from Montana. So I think the Senator from Wisconsin is in error in saying that the challenge came from this side of the Chamber.

Mr. SPOONER. I was not present during the debate. I made that statement upon what the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] said.

Mr. CARTER. If the Senator from Wisconsin will permit an interruption at that point, the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] is in error as regards the nature of the contention between the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] and myself. Primarily the right of the Secretary of War to grant permits to excavate the sands on the shores of Bering Sea was challenged under a resolution of the Senator from Washington [Mr. TURNER]. The reply of the Secretary of War was alleged, upon the other side of the Chamber, to be without warrant of law or color of right; whereupon a division of opinion arose as to the method of dealing with the question.

The Senator from Colorado presented an amendment which provided that this disputed area, known as the tide lands to shoal water, should be passed to the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Interior, and that he might prescribe rules and regulations under which miners could work there. The Senator from Montana, on the other hand, contended that the Secretary of the Interior, being so remote from the scene of activity, could not in the nature of things make reasonable rules and regulations, and that the miners on the ground should be permitted to make the rules and regulations governing their own action. The latter view was adopted by the Senate; and having been adopted by the Senate, the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART], desiring to renew the controversy, asked unanimous consent to reopen the question, and unanimous consent was granted.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to make a few explanatory remarks, as I know something about this subject.

Mr. BACON. I desire to make a remark.

Mr. STEWART. A good many of the remarks of the Senator from Georgia would be obviated if he knew something about this question.

Mr. BACON. I desire to know this: I followed the distinguished lead of the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] in that debate simply by my humble vote. I desire to know whether or not my leader upon that occasion has changed his position; in other words, whether he is still in favor of the amendment for which I had the privilege and the honor of then voting?

Mr. CARTER. The Senator from Montana still adheres to the amendment adopted, but consents to the reopening of the question that the Senator from Nevada may be permitted to present his views, and for no other purpose.

Mr. BACON. In other words, I understand that I will still be following the lead of the distinguished Senator from Montana if I adhere to his amendment and refuse to support the additional amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. CARTER. Unquestionably; and I think the Senator will be right in so doing.

Mr. BACON. In other words, the Senator from Montana does not favor the amendment of the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. CARTER. The Senator from Montana does not.

Mr. STEWART. He will favor it. [Laughter.]

Mr. CARTER. The Senator may convince me before this debate is concluded.

Mr. STEWART. I will convince the Senator that it is the only sensible thing to be done.

I am opposed to allowing the Secretary of the Interior to make rules and regulations as to mining—that is, to legislate. In order that the history of the situation may be understood, I should like to state something of the condition of the mining law, and I do it especially for the benefit of those who know nothing about it.

I have opposed for over thirty years legislation by the Government Departments in regard to the miners. The rules and regulations of the miners were approved by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Sparrow vs. Strong. I want to call the attention of those people who think so flippantly of the rules and regulations which have been adopted by the miners to some history connected with those rules and regulations which have been adopted and enforced, and also to the impropriety of turning this matter over to the Secretary of the Interior or anybody else here in Washington who knows nothing about it.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator from Nevada let me ask him a question?

Mr. STEWART. No; not now. I am teaching now, and I do not want the scholars to interfere. [Laughter.]

Mr. BACON. I simply want to know which amendment the Senator voted for the other day?

Mr. STEWART. I decline to be interrupted. I want to read from the case of Sparrow vs. Strong, in 3 Wallace. That was a case that went to the Supreme Court of the United States from the Territory of Nevada before it became a State. A motion was made by Messrs. O'Conor and Billings to dismiss the case because the parties in possession under the mining rules had no title; that they were trespassers under every law of the United States; and counsel even sneered at the idea that there should be title against the positive law of the United States. The court say:

> And we can not shut our eyes to the public history, which informs us that under this legislation—

That is, the Territorial legislation—> and not only without interference by the National Government, but under its implied sanction, vast mining interests have grown up, employing many millions of capital and contributing largely to the prosperity and improvement of the whole country.

The court held they had title, notwithstanding the statute declared that they were trespassers, and in order to sustain what they had said the court ordered the reporter to put in my statement of the then condition, and I think it is pretty important that the Senate should understand it, and I hope they will give it attention. This is what appears in the appendix:

> The remarks of Mr. Senator STEWART, of Nevada, referred to in a note on this page, were originally contained in a public letter, I think, to his fellow-Senator, Mr. Ramsey, of Minnesota. They have since been made in nearly the following form to the Senate of the United States:
> "Upon the discovery of gold in California, in 1848, a large emigration of young men immediately rushed to that modern Ophir. These people, numbering in a few months hundreds of thousands, on arriving at their future home found no laws governing the possession and occupation of mines but the common law of right, which Americans alone are educated to administer. They were forced by the very necessity of the case to make laws for themselves. The reason and justice of the laws they formed challenge the admiration of all who investigate them. Each mining district, in an area extending over not less than 50,000 square miles, formed its own rules and adopted its own customs. The similarity of these rules and customs throughout the entire mining region was so great as to attain all the beneficial results of well-digested general laws. These regulations were thoroughly democratic in their character, guarding against every form of monopoly, and requiring continued work and occupation in good faith to constitute a valid possession.
> "After the admission of California as a State, in September, 1850, Mr. Frémont, then Senator from that State, introduced a bill the purpose of which was to establish police regulations in the mines. It imposed a small tax upon the miners to defray the expenses of the system. Many Senators, when the bill came up for discussion, expressed the opinion that the mines ought to be sold or some means devised by which a direct revenue might be obtained from that source. Various amendments were offered to effect these purposes But Mr. Benton took a leading part in the discussion and contended throughout that good policy required that the mines should remain free and open for exploration and development. Mr. Seward sustained Mr. Benton.
> "The arguments of Senators in favor of free mining finally prevailed, and all amendments looking to sale or direct revenue were voted down; and the bill finally passed the Senate, without material amendment, in its original form, but failed in the House from want of time to consider it. Before the meeting of the next Congress the fact became known that the miners themselves had adopted local rules for their own government which rendered action on the part of Congress unnecessary; and from that time to the present nonaction has been the policy of the Government, with one single exception. The solemn declaration, however, just mentioned, on the part of the Senate in favor of a just and liberal policy to the miners was hailed by them as a practical recognition of their possessory rights and greatly encouraged and stimulated mining enterprise and laid the foundation for a system of local government now in full force over a vast region of country inhabited by near a million men.
> "The legislature of California, at their following session, in 1851, had under consideration the subject of legislating for the mines, and, after full and careful investigation, wisely concluded to declare that the rules and regulations of the miners themselves might be offered in evidence in all controversies respecting mining claims, and when not in conflict with the constitution or laws of the State, or of the United States, should govern the decision of the action. A series of wise judicial decisions molded these regulations and customs into a comprehensive system of common law, embracing not only mining law (properly speaking), but also regulating the use of water for mining purposes. The same system has spread over all the interior States and Territories where mines have been found, as far east as the Missouri River. The miner's law is a part of the miner's nature: he made it, and he loves it, trusts it, and obeys it. He has given the toil of his life to discover wealth, which, when found, is protected by no higher law than that enacted by himself, under the implied sanction of a just and generous Government. Miners, as a community, devote three-fourths of their aggregate labor to exploration, and consequently are, and ever will remain, poor, while individuals amass large fortunes, and the treasury of the world is augmented and replenished.
> "Persons who have not given this subject special attention can hardly realize the wonderful results of this system of free mining. The incentive to the pioneer held out by the reward of a gold or silver mine, if he can find one, is magical upon the sanguine temperament of the prospector. For near a quarter of a century a race of men, constituting a majority by far of all the miners of the West, patient of toil, hopeful of success, deprived of the associations of home and family, have devoted themselves, with untiring energy, to sinking deep shafts, running tunnels thousands of feet in solid granite, traversing deserts, climbing mountains, and enduring every conceivable hardship and privation, exploring for mines, all founded upon the idea that no change would be made in this system that would deprive them of their hard-earned treasure. Some of these have found valuable mines and a sure prospect of wealth and comfort when the appliances of capital and machinery shall be brought to their aid. Others have received no compensation but anticipation—no reward but hope.
> "While these people have done little for themselves, they have done valuable service for this Government. They have enhanced the value of the property of the nation near 100 per cent; have converted that vast unknown region extending from British Columbia on the north to Mexico on the south, and from the eastern slope of the Rocky Mountains to the western decline of the Sierra Nevada, into the great gold and silver fields of the United States, surpassing in richness and extent the mines of any other nation on the globe. I assert, and no one familiar with the subject will question the fact, that the sand plains, alkaline deserts, and dreary mountains of rocks, and sage brush of the great interior, would have been as worthless to-day as when they were marked by geographers as the great American desert, but for this system of free mining fostered by our neglect, and matured and perfected by our generous inaction. No miner has ever doubted the continued good faith of the Government, but has put his trust in its justice and liberality, traversing mountain and desert as incessantly and as hopefully as the farmer of the West has plowed his field. What he now occupies he has discovered and added to the wealth of the nation.
> "This good faith of the Government (promised, as it were, by the action of the Senate sixteen years ago) not only inspired enterprise and led to discoveries the magnitude and importance of which can not be overestimated, but in the time of the severest trials of the Union no people were more loyal than the miners. They lost no opportunity to enlist in your armies or contribute to the support of the Government. Their liberal donation to the sanitary fund was but a slight manifestation of their deep love of the Union and sympathy for its suffering heroes. The little town in which I reside contributed in gold coin over $112,000, being at the time about $80 to each voting inhabitant, and a like liberality was displayed by the whole coast. The people are truly grateful to a generous Government, and time seems to have strengthened the regard they feel for their native land and their early homes; but they look with jealous eyes upon every proposition for the sale of the mines which they have discovered and made valuable. Any public man who advocates it, with whatever motive, is liable to be condemned and discarded as an unfaithful servant. The reason for this is obvious. It is their all, secured through long years of incessant toil and privation, and they associate any sale with a sale at auction, where capital is to compete with poverty, fraud and intrigue with truth and honesty."
> It is not because they do not desire a fee-simple title, for this they would prize above all else; but most of them are poor and unable to purchase in competition with capitalists and speculators, which the adoption of any plan heretofore proposed would compel them to do, and for these reasons the opposition to the sale of the mineral lands has been unanimous in the mining States and Territories.
>
> To extend the preemption system applicable to agricultural lands to the mines is absurd and impossible. Nature does not deposit the precious metals in rectangular forms, descending between perpendicular lines into the earth, but in veins or lodes varying from 1 foot to 300 feet in width, dipping from a perpendicular from 1° to 80°, and coursing through mountains and ravines at nearly every point of the compass. In exploring for vein mines it is a vein or lode that is discovered, not a quarter section of land marked by surveyed boundaries.
> In working a vein more or less land is required, depending upon its size, course, dip, and a great variety of other circumstances, not possible to provide for in passing general laws. Sometimes these veins are found in groups, within a few feet of each other, and dipping into the earth at an angle of from thirty to fifty degrees, as at Freiberg, in Saxony, or Austin, in Nevada. In such case a person buying a single acre in a rectangular form would have several mines at the surface and none at five hundred or a thousand feet in depth. With such a division of a mine, one owning it at the surface, another at a greater depth, neither would be justified in expending money in costly machinery, deep shafts, and long tunnels for the working of the same. Nor will it do to sell the land in advance of discovery, for this would stop explorations, and practically limit our mining wealth to the mines already found, for no one would "prospect" with much energy upon the land of another, and land speculators never find mines. The mineral lands must remain open and free to exploration and development; and while this policy is pursued our mineral resources are inexhaustible. There is room enough for every prospector who wishes to try his luck in hunting for new mines for a thousand years of exploration, and yet there will be plenty of mines undiscovered. It would be a national calamity to adopt any system that would close that region to the prospector.

The question then presents itself. How shall the Government give title, so important for permanent prosperity, and avoid these intolerable evils? I answer, there is but one mode, and that is to assure the title to those who now or hereafter may occupy according to local rules, suited to the character of the mines and the circumstances of each mining district. In the increasing agitation of the subject by the introduction into Congress of bills which miners regard as a system of confiscation, and which tend to destroy all confidence in mining titles, we now need statutes which shall continue the system of free mining and hold the mineral lands open to exploration and occupation, subject to legislation by Congress and local rules; something which recognizes the obligation of the Government to respect private rights which have grown up under its tacit consent and approval, and which shall be in harmony with the legislation of 1865, protecting possessory rights, irrespective of any paramount interest of the United States. The system will be in harmony with the rules of property as understood by a million men, with the legislation of nine States and Territories, with a course of judicial decisions extending over near a quarter of a century, and finally ratified and confirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States; in harmony, in short, with justice and good policy.

A system such as the eloquent Senator conceived to be accordant with these ideas was introduced by him to the Senate in June, 1866. (See the Daily Globe, of June 19, 1866.)

Mr. RAWLINS. Will the Senator yield to me for a question?

Mr. STEWART. I will yield for a mere question; but I have got a few more remarks to make.

Mr. RAWLINS. I understood the Senator's proposed amendment to give effect to the miners' rules as to all mining lands above low tide, but it proposes to transfer to the Secretary of War the authority to grant licenses for mining below.

Mr. STEWART. It leaves that just as it is.

Mr. RAWLINS. Does not the Senator——

Mr. STEWART. I do not want to be diverted by answering questions. I will come to that in a moment. I want to do a little schoolmaster work just now.

Mr. RAWLINS. That was the point on which I desired enlightenment from the Senator.

Mr. STEWART. I know, but I do not want to be interrupted now.

The following year, after a very extended controversy in which I labored harder than I ever did in my life, for I had been familiar with how the system had grown up; I had been a part of it; for I was in the first miners' meeting which established laws in California for the government of vein mining. As new mines were opened such laws were adopted and spread all over the country. In 1866 there was a proposition by Mr. Julian, chairman of the Committee on Public Lands of the House of Representatives, to sell mines at auction. We had to take some action or be ruined.

I had one bill passed through the Senate which went to the House, and went to the foot of the Calendar. A California member had a bill pending regarding ditch rights. I managed to get my bill passed as an amendment to that; and it went on the House bill as a Senate amendment; which brought it nearer the top of the Calendar and gave it some advantage in the struggle for supremacy. Finally, by the means of a two-thirds vote, it was carried over Mr. Julian's head, and became a law. The title of the bill under those circumstances was a little queer. It was entitled "An act granting a right of way to ditch and canal owners over the public lands, and for other purposes." I call attention to the first section of the act, which was passed on the 26th of July, 1866. That section reads:

That the mineral lands of the public domain, both surveyed and unsurveyed, are hereby declared to be free and open to exploration and occupation by all citizens of the United States, and those who have declared their intention to become citizens, subject to such regulations as may be prescribed by law, and subject also to the local customs or rules of miners in the several mining districts, so far as the same may not be in conflict with the laws of the United States.

Subsequently I introduced a bill and had extra copies of it printed, sent them out to the miners in all the mining districts, and continued to do so for six years, and finally in 1872 the law which has remained ever since was passed. It was really made for the miners. It was criticised in every mining district. To every mine owner and mining engineer were sent copies, and it was digested according to the suggestions, and it resulted in a law which was passed in 1872, and which has not been changed since. Some little things grew up by the decisions of the Department that we thought ought to be changed. I introduced a bill several times to try to change those. The Senator from Colorado was on the committee. We fixed it up and sent it out, but it did not meet with general approval, because we could not get the consent of the miners to have the law of 1872 changed. That is the reason why I do not want to authorize any Department of this Government to change it. It has worked well. Local disputes have been settled there, and the mining laws of the United States are the best in the world.

They were the result of the experience of the miners, not mine alone. I merely sent it out with suggestions from time to time. The first law was mostly mine; but after that, when it came to define claims, etc., a very difficult matter, we wanted the experience of mining engineers and miners. Then this law was passed. The first section of the law of 1872, which is in the Revised Statutes, is as follows:

All valuable mineral deposits in lands belonging to the United States, both surveyed and unsurveyed, are hereby declared to be free and open to exploration and purchase, and the lands in which they are found to occupation and purchase, by citizens of the United States and those who have declared their intention to become such, under regulations prescribed by law, and according to the local customs or rules of miners in the several mining districts, so far as the same are applicable and not inconsistent with the laws of the United States.

Then this statute further provides:

The miners of each mining district may make regulations not in conflict with the laws of the United States, or with the laws of the State or Territory in which the district is situated, governing the location, manner of recording, amount of work necessary to hold possession of a mining claim, subject to the following requirements: The location must be distinctly marked on the ground so that its boundaries can be readily traced. All records of mining claims hereafter made shall contain the name or names of the locators, the date of the location, and such a description of the claim or claims located by reference to some natural object or permanent monument as will identify the claim. On each claim located after the 10th day of May, 1872, and until a patent has been issued therefor, not less than $100 worth of labor shall be performed or improvements made during each year. On all claims located prior to the 10th day of May, 1872, $10 worth of labor shall be performed or improvements made by the 10th day of June, 1874, and each year thereafter, for each 100 feet in length along the vein until a patent has been issued therefor; but where such claims are held in common such expenditure may be made upon any one claim.

It goes on and makes those regulations. That is the limit to which the miners have the power to legislate. They can legislate subject to those rules and regulations. That is all they can do up in that Territory. When we get the rules and regulations as specific as they are, as careful as they are, with limitations to cover every case of abuse, leaving them to legislate within those bounds, you do not want any rules and regulations of the Departments making new laws. The miners will fix it better than anybody else. That is the experience of more than a generation. They have done it, and all our rights have grown up under it.

I objected to the amendment of the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] principally because it delegated the power to legislate to the Secretary of the Interior. The Secretary of the Interior knows nothing about these laws. Half of the Senate know nothing about them. Those who live there—the miners—know about them. The courts know about them; the courts enforce them, and you have had peace and development and a fair administration of justice.

So far as concerns this amendment as it now stands, there is general power given to the Secretary of War to protect navigable waters, and anyone who interferes with them he has the right to arrest and punish, etc. It is made criminal to interfere with the navigable waters, and persons are not likely to fit out expeditions and go out there because they might meet with arbitrary interference by the War Department. They might fear to do it. They would not want to invest upon an uncertainty. Consequently the Secretary has granted permits below low tide, and there the miners' laws could not operate. You could not locate a claim. You could not put up stakes. You could not put up monuments. You could not comply with any of the conditions necessary to locate a mining claim, because you must put up monuments and make reference to some known object. You could not do that in deep sea. You can not locate a mining claim at deep sea provided Congress authorized it.

These regulations can not be applied to that. They are not provided for the ocean, but for the land. You must have land in order to make the mining laws apply. You can make them applicable above low tide, because you can get there when the water is low and put monuments there that would probably stay and refer to something on land, and so locate under the mining laws; but below low tide you can not do it. A person who is going to invest must have some guaranty that the Government will not interfere. It will take hundreds of thousands of dollars perhaps to fit out machinery to work the ocean. It is a new thing. The miners do not want this, and there is no reason why we should attempt to extend the rules and regulations into the ocean.

The difficulty about the amendment of the Senator from Montana as it stands now is that it says the miners' laws shall be extended into the ocean. You can not operate them there. My amendment limits the extent of the mining laws to low tide, where the miners' laws are applicable, and expressly limits the permits of the Secretary of War to the land below low tide. It makes a distinction. I hope it will be examined. It has been ordered to be printed and laid over. I hope it will be examined by Senators, because this is a very important matter. It would be very dangerous if, without consideration, we should introduce a novelty into the mining laws, which have gone on for more than a generation and which Congress has been unable to change because public sentiment is so strong in their favor, which have settled the rights of property so long and upon which so much depends. It ought not to be done. Before it is done we ought to see what they are, how they have grown up, what is dependent upon them. The miners in the country understand them. The miners who go to Alaska will take with them these laws as the immigrants who went to California took with them the common sense of American citizens to make such laws to protect themselves.

If we have no mining law for Alaska except that which the miners make, you will see it is all right. When it is said they will do all sorts of rash and foolish things it is a mistake. There may be men who may want to do it, but the general public sentiment where all are interested in having good laws and in enforcing them is so strong that no wrongdoer can withstand it. I have seen a community of 200,000, in a climate which was congenial, where every man could go into the ravines and dig and get money, where the majority of the inhabitants were not 30 years old, the ages ranging from 18 to 25, and they made rules and regulations that fitted the situation. They enforced those rules until the courts came in. Absolute justice almost was done. The weak were protected. You will find it so up there. I tell you the miners are a pretty good set of men.

The idea of being afraid that anybody will monopolize that country! It can not be done under the rules and regulations that can be made subject to the mining laws. Let foreigners or anybody else go into that region; the more the better. We want gold. It is a hardy race that does it. They will be punished for doing it. Most of them will lose their lives. Very few will make a success, but the prospect held out, the occasional find, is such that it will lead them on. Let them be Laplanders, or let them be Swedes, or let them be Norwegians or Americans, or let them be who they will, if they will go into the Arctic regions and discover mines and help to relieve mankind of the contraction of the gold standard, let them go. I want free mining. I am glad the Canadian government made no distinction between citizens and aliens, except in one instance, and I hope they will take that back. As to placer mining in British Columbia, not on the Yukon, in 1899, aliens were prohibited from locating. I am sorry she did it. We want to appeal to her to change that.

There is Russia. For the last forty years I have heard constantly from men who have been there. Siberia was a penal colony, and men could not mine there. They have gone there with permission. They would get permission from the authorities to travel through the country. They saw the situation. There is a very vast mining region in Russia. The world has got to have gold. They are hardy men who are willing to make great sacrifices to dig for gold. It is not a profitable business.

I prefer to let our people work in the Tropics and produce sugar and other articles with which to buy gold. We are paying out two hundred and fifty millions for tropical products. I want the islands kept, and I want to see sugar and coffee and all the other tropical commodities we require produced there, so as to keep our money at home. If we can do that, let the hardy Norwegians and Laplanders mine in the frozen zones about the Bering Sea. What they get will be turned into the channels of commerce, and we can buy it a great deal more cheaply than we can earn it.

There are only a very small class of people who are willing to make those sacrifices, and those who do I would not trammel. I would encourage them, because they are doing great good to mankind. Let them be encouraged. Ninety-nine out of a hundred of them die in poverty and must necessarily in this contest. In seeking for gold the prize is very great, and there is a class of hardy men who will do it, and they should not be checked or trammeled or dealt unfairly with.

As to California, there were wise men in the Senate. Seward and Benton and Chase and others were here then, who were wise in this regard. It was a common sense to let the miners alone, and letting them alone accomplished great results. They built up States out of that wilderness. They had good laws. They were allowed to develop that country. They made it what it is. Let those laws be taken by our people to Alaska. Do not trammel them. Do not make regulations here that they do not understand and confiscate their property. When they have found property, protect it, deal honestly and fairly with them, and they will be the greatest benefactors of any we will have, not to themselves, but to us.

I have heard people engaged here in manufacturing and raising products laugh when it was said they made more money here, and all that, and that mining was bad, after all. But you must have gold. You passed a decree that money should only be stamped on gold. Now let the Norwegians and the Danes and the Laplanders dig gold. Do not stop that. Do not throw any obstructions in their way, and you will have plenty of gold. The gold standard may be all right if we have plenty of gold. It is only a question of quantity. Let Russia, let the country all around Bering Sea and Hudson Bay, let this Arctic region, closed against mankind for centuries, be opened. Let them get gold and supply you. You must have that article. Now let them dig it. The idea that you should pass laws that will cause other countries to retaliate! If you commence proscribing foreigners, other countries will do the same, and this vast region will be shut up for all time.

The most liberal policy should be adopted toward foreigners about the Arctic Ocean, because very few of our people will go there. Some of them have the mining instinct, but none but that class will go and none but that class will stay. I believe in letting that class have their own way, and they will see that they have fair play as between each other. They have the strongest sense of fair play and justice. In this document which has been read the military commander says they are the most peaceable and law-abiding people he ever saw. Of course they are, because every man there is interested in seeing that the laws are executed. He is a law giver and an executor of the law, and all depends upon good laws faithfully executed. That is the situation up there.

When this matter comes up again, if further explanation is desired I will be glad to make it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I wish to have an order made before proceeding to the execution of the unanimous-consent agreement. I understand the Senator from Montana is willing that the Alaska bill shall go over for the day.

Mr. CARTER. I have no objection to the bill going over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment has gone over.

Mr. CARTER. I suggest, however, that the amendment for which the amendment of the Senator from Nevada is proposed as a substitute be printed separately, to the end that Senators may understand it.

Mr. TELLER. Let all amendments be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Montana has been printed.

Mr. CARTER. It has merely been printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. All three amendments will be printed.

Mr. CARTER. Let it be printed as perfected.

Mr. TELLER. Let all amendments which have been offered be printed.

BALTIMORE AND POTOMAC RAILROAD.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that 500 additional copies of the bill (S. 1929) to provide for eliminating certain grade crossings on the line of the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company, in the city of Washington, D. C., and requiring said company to depress and elevate its tracks, and to enable it to relocate parts of its railroad therein, and for other purposes, together with the report thereon, be printed. The supply in the document room is exhausted.

The motion was agreed to.

EMILY BURKE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the unanimous-consent agreement heretofore made, the first pension case on the Calendar will be stated.

The bill (H. R. 4089) granting a pension to Emily Burke was announced as the first bill in order; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Emily Burke, widow of John Burke, late first lieutenant Company F, Seventy-third Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and to pay her a pension of $12 per month and $2 per month additional for each of her minor children until such children shall arrive at the age of 16 years.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN S. DUKATE.

The bill (H. R. 3214) granting a pension to John S. Dukate was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of John S. Dukate, late assistant surgeon, Fifty-third Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and to pay him a pension of $17 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN B. WETHERBEE.

The bill (S. 3139) granting a pension to J. B. Wetherbee was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John B. Wetherbee, late cook with Company G, First Regiment Washington Volunteer Infantry, war with Spain, and pay him a pension at the rate of $40 per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. In connection with this bill I desire to have the report printed in the RECORD. This is a man who was not enlisted, but he was very dangerously wounded, so much so that he is entirely paralyzed in his lower limbs, and according to the rule of our committee he becomes pensionable by special act. I should like to have the report printed in the RECORD to show why it is proposed to pension him.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be printed in the RECORD.

The report referred to is as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3139) granting a pension to J. B. Wetherbee, have examined the same and report:

The claimant, John B. Wetherbee, was a cook in the employ of Company G, First Regiment Washington Volunteers, and while so serving with the company in the Philippine Islands was severely injured by a gunshot wound of the back and spine at Paco Church, near Manila, while serving in the ranks and assisting in the construction of a telegraph line.

The following is an official report from the War Department regarding the occurrence:

RECORD AND PENSION OFFICE, WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, February 16, 1900.

SIR: Referring to your letter of the 10th instant, addressed to the Surgeon-General of the Army and by him transmitted to this office, where it was received yesterday, in which letter you request a copy of the report of the medical treatment of J. B. Wetherbee, who was engaged as cook for Company G, First Regiment Washington Volunteers, and was wounded at Paco Church, Manila, February 5, 1899, a report of whose medical treatment, made at the Presidio, Cal., it is stated, has been placed on file in this Department, I beg to state that an examination has been made of all records on file deemed likely to afford information in the case, but the special report referred to has not been found on file.

It appears from the records, however, that J. B. Weatherby, whose name also appears upon the records as Wetherbee, civilian cook, Company G, First Washington Infantry Volunteers, was wounded severely by a gunshot wound of the back and spine at Paco, Manila, Philippine Islands, February 5, 1899, and it is stated that he fought in the ranks with Company G, although he was not an enlisted man.

The records also show that he was treated in various hospitals, including the general hospital at Presidio, San Francisco, from February 5, 1899, to November 1, 1899, for gunshot wound, "Mauser," severe, center spinal column, which produced partial paralysis of the lower limbs. It is stated on the records that there was no evidence of the exit of the bullet, and that it was not found by the X ray.

Very respectfully,
JOHN TWEEDALE,
Acting Chief Record and Pension Office.

Hon. W. L. JONES,
House of Representatives.

A petition signed by large numbers of the officers and men of the First Washington Volunteer Infantry accompanies the bill and sets forth that at the time claimant received his wound he was standing on the stone bridge assisting members of the Signal Corps to raise a telegraph wire. Previous to this he, with Company D, First Washington Volunteers, was engaged in firing into the church from which our men were receiving a fire from the enemy. Claimant was requested by the officer in charge of the detail engaged in raising the wire to assist them, he being told that it was desired to establish communication between certain points as soon as possible. While thus engaged claimant was wounded by a bullet fired by an insurgent, presumably from a house near by.

The following are sworn statements by claimant and medical officers, showing the circumstances, and also setting forth the nature and extent of the wound:

I, J. B. Weatherbee, make the following statement:

I joined the regiment the 1st day of November, 1898, at Honolulu, Hawaiian Islands, acting in the capacity of cook of Company G, First Washington Volunteer Infantry. I went to Manila with the regiment, acting in that capacity up to February 5, 1899. On January 8, 1899, I was issued arms and ammunition by the company commander, Capt. M. Ellrich, of Company G, First Washington Volunteers, as the condition at that time was such that every able-bodied man was needed to defend the position. From that time until February 5, 1899, I was called on for outpost duty the same as any enlisted man in the regiment. On February 5, at the battle of Paco Church, I was ordered by an officer of the United States Signal Corps to assist in establishing telegraphic communications with the lines, and while in the act of raising a telegraph wire I was struck by a bullet in the back, fired by one of the insurgents, and fell helpless

I was carried from the field by Albert Anderson and Lieutenant Bryan, of the First Washington, and lay in the First Reserve Hospital at Manila until March 28, 1899, then in the Second Reserve Hospital until June 2, 1899. During those months I lay completely paralyzed and perfectly helpless as regards the use of my lower limbs and suffered intense pain. From June 2 to August 2 I was aboard the hospital ship Relief, reaching San Francisco August 2, 1899, and being sent to the hospital at Presidio. The sea voyage and change of climate improved my physical condition so that I could be lifted from my bed, and by the assistance of persons or crutches move a little. Reference to the hospital reports of Manila and the Presidio will show the exact condition more completely than I could state it here. There is among those reports a photograph of the wound, as shown by the X-rays. Surgeons have always refused to operate, considering that the location of the ball so near the heart and spine renders an operation dangerous and probably fatal, and all surgeons have refused to undertake the risk of performing it.

Carried in the arms of my comrades, I was taken aboard the ship Queen at San Francisco on November 4, 1899, and brought to Seattle; was carried in their arms from steamer to carriage and from carriage to hospital, and the Red Cross and Fortson Relief Corps (a similar organization) have undertaken the entire charge of my expenses up to this time. On November 25, 1899, I was removed from the hospital to a private residence, but am obliged to have the care of a nurse. My physical condition is improved; my helplessness is not so great as during the first eight months after I was wounded, but I am entirely unable to perform any labor of any kind or do the least thing toward my own support, and am obliged to have assistance even in caring for me personally.

I have no real estate or personal property that will aid me in my support, and while I have living relatives, they are not financially able to assist me in the least degree. My sole income since November, 1898, has been one month's pay as cook of Company G, First Washington Volunteer Infantry, after reaching Manila, and $100, contributed largely by the enlisted men of Company G. The Red Cross and Fortson Relief Corps have, as I stated before, assumed all responsibility for my care and attention since I reached Seattle, November 6. I am a single man and have no one except myself dependent upon me. I have no assurance from any physician who has ever examined my case, in the United States service or out of it, that I will be able to support myself again. While it is evident that my physical condition is improving, it does not place me in a condition to do anything for my own support at the present time.

The surgeons in charge of my case from the time I was wounded until I left the hospital at the Presidio were Major Crosby, U. S. A., in charge of the First Reserve Hospital at Manila, and Major Fitzgerald, of the Thirteenth Minnesota Volunteers; at the Second Reserve Hospital at Manila was Capt. Frank B. Kiefer, surgeon, U. S. A.; on the hospital ship Relief was Major Bradley; at the Presidio hospital were Colonel Gerard and former regimental doctor Maj. L. R. Dawson, whose reports in the War Department will give a more detailed account of my case than I can give or secure from them, scattered, as they are, out of the reach of my knowledge of their whereabouts. Maj. L. R. Dawson examined me at Manila at the First Reserve Hospital, and on about the 1st day of February, 1900, examined me at Seattle, Wash. His affidavit and that of Dr. A. B. Kibbe accompany this paper.

Praying that the Government for which I fought will recognize my great need and reward my services by relieving me from dependence upon the charity of others, I am,

J. B. WETHERBEE.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 8th day of March, 1900.

SEATTLE, WASH., February 21, 1900.

John B. Wetherbee, civilian cook of G Company, First Washington Infantry, United States Volunteers, was wounded in the back during general engagement of February 5, 1899, near Paco Church, Manila, Philippine Islands. I saw him two days later in Ward 2 of the First Reserve Hospital, Manila, Philippine Islands, at which time he was completely paralyzed from the hips down, with no control of bowels or bladder.

He was in the First Reserve Hospital a long time, and was sent thence to the general hospital at the Presidio of San Francisco, Cal. He came to Seattle with a part of the First Washington Infantry, United States Volunteers, on the steamship Queen of the Pacific, and was sent to the Seattle general hospital for a time by the Seattle Red Cross Society.

About the 1st day of February I examined him, with Dr. A. B. Kibbe, by the Roentgen ray in the office of Dr. Kibbe. The fluoroscope showed a projection or protrusion on the left side of the spine at level of fourth or fifth dorsal vertebra, which Dr. Kibbe and myself both regarded as the missile which inflicted the wound, surrounded by an inflammatory thickening or exudate. The scar of the wound of entrance was about 2 inches to the right of the spinous processes, and about 1¼ inches lower than the site of the missile, which corroborated his statement that his arms were raised above his head at the moment he received the wound.

At this time he was able to stand alone, supported by his crutches, and, with their support, to walk alone a short distance. The kneejerk was exaggerated decidedly in both legs. The left knee was still rather stiff, and the muscles of both legs considerably atrophied.

LEWIS R. DAWSON, M. D.,
Late Major-Surgeon First Washington Infantry, U. S. V.

The foregoing subscribed and sworn to before me by said Lewis R. Dawson this 21st day of February, 1900.
[SEAL.] H. J. RAMSEY,
Notary Public in and for the State of Washington, residing at Seattle.

SEATTLE, March 1, 1900.

With reference to the case of John B. Weatherbee, described in full by Dr. L. R. Dawson, I can say that I also examined Mr. Weatherbee with the fluoroscope and found the same conditions described by Dr. Dawson, and that I fully concur with his diagnosis and opinions in the case.

ALFRED B. KIBBE, M. D.

The foregoing subscribed and sworn to before me by said Alfred B. Kibbe this 1st day of March, 1900.

H. J. RAMSEY,
Notary Public in and for the State of Washington, residing at Seattle.

Other evidence accompanying the bill shows that claimant is practically a helpless cripple from his wound, and that he has no means whatever, but is dependent upon the Red Cross Society and other charitable organizations at Seattle, Wash., where he now resides.

Not being an enlisted man, claimant can obtain no relief under existing pension laws, but, in view of the foregoing facts, your committee are of the opinion that it would be but an act of justice to grant him a pension for his wound.

The passage of the bill is therefore recommended when amended as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John B. Wetherbee, late cook with Company G, First Regiment Washington Volunteer Infantry, war with Spain, and pay him a pension at the rate of $40 per month."

Also amend title so as to read: "A bill granting a pension to John B. Wetherbee."

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill granting a pension to John B. Wetherbee."

CATHARINE WEINHEIMER.

The bill (S. 3436) granting a pension to Caroline Wienhimer was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Catharine Weinheimer, widow of Melchior Weinheimer, late of Company I, First Regiment United States Reserve Corps Missouri Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $24 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving: Provided, That in the event of the death of Catharine Weinheimer, invalid and dependent child of said Melchior Weinheimer, the additional pension herein granted on account of such child shall cease and determine.

Mr. COCKRELL. This bill, as I introduced it, was for "Caroline Wienhimer, the idiotic and deformed child of Melchoir Wienhimer, of Companies K and I, First Regiment United States Reserve Corps Missouri Volunteer Infantry." I did not know that the mother was drawing a pension. I suppose she is.

Mr. GALLINGER. She is. I will say to the Senator that the mother is drawing a pension, and it is not the habit of the Bureau to grant two pensions for the same service, but this was a case of great distress, and instead of pensioning the child the committee thought it advisable to increase the pension of the mother, as the substitute bill does. I move that, in line 11, the committee amendment be amended by striking out the words "on account of such child," after the word "granted."

Mr. COCKRELL. Let us see how that would read.

The SECRETARY. In line 11 strike out the words "on account of such child;" so as to read:

The additional pension herein granted shall cease and determine.

Mr. GALLINGER. In the event of the death of the child the additional pension would cease and determine. I think the Senator from Missouri will, upon examining the case, see that the committee acted wisely in this matter.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have no objection to it at all. I simply did not want to get it confused, and I did not know the mother was a pensioner.

Mr. GALLINGER. Such is the fact. I will say to the Senator that a certain other body is getting quite in the habit of sending such bills over here. The committee has one before it granting three pensions for one service.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not want that done. I want to conform strictly to the rule of the committee. I drew this bill without knowing anything about the widow drawing any pension at all. I drew it on account of this helpless and dependent child of a soldier.

Mr. GALLINGER. Precisely.

Mr. COCKRELL. But the committee has reported it properly to increase the widow's pension on account of this dependent child, and then that the increased pension shall cease at the death of the child.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is to cease on the death of the child.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 7, after the word "Cavalry," to insert "and pay him a pension at the rate of $12 per month;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Samuel W. Childs, late of the quartermaster's department, Company E, First Oregon Cavalry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARY CORINNE BLANDIN.

The bill (S. 3922) granting an increase of pension to Mary Corinne Blandin was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Mary Corinne Blandin, widow of Lieut. John Joseph Blandin, late of the United States Navy, and to pay her a pension of $50 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOSEPH E. BALDWIN.

The bill (H. R. 3454) granting a pension to Joseph E. Baldwin was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Joseph E. Baldwin, late of Company C, First Regiment Enrolled Missouri Militia, Company C, Seventh Regiment Enrolled Missouri Militia, and Company E, Thirty-second Regiment Enrolled Missouri Militia, and to pay him a pension of $12 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MEXICAN WAR PENSIONS.

The bill (S. 3683) to increase the pensions of widows of the Mexican war soldiers and sailors to $16 per month was announced as next on the Calendar.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let that bill be passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. PETTUS. I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the pension bills to let us know why the Mexican pension bill should go over?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the unanimous-consent agreement the bill will go over because, being an adverse report, it is regarded as objected to.

Mr. PETTUS. Is there an adverse report with the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes, sir; and there being an adverse report, it is in the nature of an objection, and under the unanimous-consent agreement the bill would go over anyway.

The bill (S. 250) granting increase of pension to soldiers of the Mexican war was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That bill will also go over, it being adversely reported.

ELISHA F. BARTON.

The bill (S. 3268) granting an increase of pension to Elisha F. Barton was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 8, before the word "dollars," to strike out "fifteen" and insert "twelve;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Elisha F. Barton, late of Company E, Fourth Regiment Delaware Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $12 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARY P. HUNTER.

The bill (S. 3634) granting a pension to Mary P. Hunter was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 8, before the word "dollars," to strike out "twelve" and insert "eight;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary P. Hunter, widow of Joseph Hunter, late of Company C, Sixth Regiment Delaware Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $8 per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SARAH CLARK.

The bill (S. 3900) granting a pension to Sarah Clark was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 6, after the initial "W.," to strike out "Cook" and insert "Clark;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Sarah Clark, widow of John W. Clark, late of Company G, Sixth Regiment Delaware Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN H. HARRISON.

The bill (S. 3708) granting a pension to John H. Harrison was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with amendments, in line 6, after the word "of," to insert "U. S. S. Walker;" and in line 8, before the word "dollars," to strike out "twenty-four" and insert "twelve;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John H. Harrison, late of U. S. S. Walker, United States Navy, and pay him a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JAMES COOK.

The bill (S. 3899) granting a pension to James Cook was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of James Cook, late of Company G, Sixth Regiment Delaware Volunteer Infantry, and to pay him a pension of $12 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MISSOURI B. ROSS.

The bill (H. R. 1677) granting an increase of pension to Missouri B. Ross was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Missouri B. Ross, widow of Orlando H. Ross, late of Company D, Twentieth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, and captain and aid-de-camp, staff of General Grant, and to pay her a pension of $12 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ISAAC M. LOCKE.

The bill (H. R. 1681) granting an increase of pension to Isaac M. Locke was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Isaac M. Locke, late of Company F, Fifteenth Regiment West Virginia Volunteer Infantry, and to pay him a pension of $20 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LAVINIA M. PAYNE.

The bill (H. R. 2303) granting an increase of pension to Lavinia M. Payne was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with amendments, in line 7, after the word "pension," to insert "at the rate;" and in line 8, before the word "dollars," to strike out "twenty-four" and insert "twenty;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Lavinia M. Payne, late a nurse in the medical department of United States Volunteers, and pay her a pension at the rate of $20 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the committee amendments be disagreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the committee amendments will be disagreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CALVIN E. MYERS.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am directed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3654) granting a pension to Calvin E. Myers, to report it without amendment. I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Calvin E. Myers, late of Company E, Fourth Regiment Tennessee Volunteer Infantry, and to pay him a pension of $12 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT GREAT FALLS, MONT.

Mr. CARTER. I ask unanimous consent of the Senate for the present consideration of the bill (S. 943) to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Great Falls, Mont.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to acquire, at a cost not exceeding $20,000, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a site, and cause to be erected thereon a suitable building, including fireproof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, for the use and accommodation of the United States post-office and other Government offices in the city of Great Falls and State of Montana, the cost of said site and building, including said vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and approaches, complete, not to exceed the sum of $200,000.

Proposals for the sale of land suitable for said site shall be invited by public advertisement in one or more of the newspapers of said city of largest circulation for at least twenty days prior to the date specified in said advertisement for the opening of said proposals.

Proposals made in response to said advertisement shall be addressed and mailed to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall then cause the said proposed sites, and such others as he may think proper to designate, to be examined in person by an agent of the Treasury Department, who shall make written report to said Secretary of the results of said examination and of his recommendation thereon and the reasons therefore, which shall be accompanied by the original proposals and all maps, plats, and statements which shall have come into his possession relating to said proposed sites.

If, upon consideration of said report and accompanying papers, the Secretary of the Treasury shall deem further investigation necessary, he may appoint a commission of not more than three persons, one of whom shall be an officer of the Treasury Department, which commission shall also examine the said proposed sites, and such others as the Secretary of the Treasury may designate, and grant such hearings in relation thereto as they shall deem necessary; and said commission shall, within thirty days after said examination, make to the Secretary of the Treasury written report of their conclusion in the premises, accompanied by all maps, statements, plats, or documents taken by or submitted to them, in like manner as hereinbefore provided in regard to the proceedings of said agent of the Treasury Department; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall thereupon finally determine the location of the building to be erected.

The compensation of said commissioners shall be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, but the same shall not exceed $6 per day and actual traveling expenses: Provided, however, That the member of said commission appointed from the Treasury Department shall be paid only his actual traveling expenses.

The building shall be unexposed to danger from fire by an open space of at least 40 feet on each side, including streets and alleys.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EAST WASHINGTON HEIGHTS RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. SULLIVAN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 4604) to amend the charter of the East Washington Heights Traction Railroad Company.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with amendments, on page 2, section 1, line 5, after the word "northward," to strike out "along the Anacostia road" and insert "on Minnesota avenue as laid down on the highway-extension plans;" and in line 9, after the word "Columbia," to strike out the following proviso:

Provided, That said railway shall be removed from Anacostia road and placed in Minnesota avenue within one year after said avenue is opened up as a public thoroughfare.

So as to make the section read:

That the charter of the East Washington Heights Traction Railroad Company, of the District of Columbia, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to authorize and permit the said company to lay down its tracks and operate its cars from its present authorized terminus at the western approach to the Pennsylvania Avenue Bridge, as provided in section 1 of the act of incorporation; thence north on Seventeenth street east to East Capitol street; thence west on East Capitol street to Fifteenth street east, connecting with the Metropolitan Railway; also from the intersection of Minnesota avenue and Harrison street thence westerly on Harrison street to Pierce street; thence southerly on Pierce street to Jackson street; thence westerly along Jackson street to Monroe street; also northward on Minnesota avenue as laid down on the highway-extension plans, to connect with the Columbia Railway at Benning, over a route and at a point acceptable to and approved by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add to section 2 the following proviso:

Provided, That if within two years from the date of the passage of this act the Washington and Marlboro Railroad Company shall build its lines into and within the District of Columbia, then said company shall have the right to use such of the routes in this act provided for as may coincide with the route provided for in the charter of the said Washington and Marlboro Railroad Company.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

JERONEMUS S. UNDERHILL.

Mr. WARREN. I desire to call up at this time the bill (S. 2259) for the relief of Jeronemus S. Underhill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). The Senator from Wyoming asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill, which will be read for the information of the Senate.

Mr. WARREN. It is a bill that was passed over without prejudice some days ago.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that the bill has been read once, and unless a request be made for another reading it will not now be read.

Mr. BATE. I ask to have the bill read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be again read.

The Secretary read the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HALE. Yes; I object, Mr. President.

Mr. WARREN. I will ask the Senator from Maine if he will not withdraw his objection for a moment until I can state the case?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. This is one of a class of claims which have engaged the attention of the Committee on Claims more or less for a good many years, one of a class of bills some of which have passed this Senate or passed the House at different sessions alternately, and some of which have passed both Houses. This bill has not yet passed both Houses. The committee have spent a good deal of time in examining the entire subject relating to the causes which have led up to these claims, and to the reports of the so-called Marchand and Selfridge boards with regard to the construction of this class of boats. We have allowed some bills to go through with less scrutiny than we give to others; and we now seek to get the findings of the Court of Claims, I might say, on sample or representative cases, and the Committee on Claims have prepared a statement which goes over the entire subject briefly, and which, if the bill is allowed to pass, as I hope it will be, I want to have inserted in the RECORD and also printed as a miscellaneous document, so that we may be able to fully consider and to reach some finality regarding this class of claims.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

Mr. WARREN. I hope the Senator will not object.

Mr. HALE. I do not know that I shall object, but I want a little information. I did not hear the bill fully read.

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator that this case was passed upon by one of these special naval boards, and now it is proposed to ask the Court of Claims to review the findings of the board.

Mr. HALE. What I want to ask the Senator is, What class of cases does this bill cover? Is it one of the ships lately built, while we have been increasing the Navy within the last ten or twelve years, or is it one of the old cases that we have passed, of claims in reference to vessels used during the war of the rebellion?

Mr. WARREN. This is an old case. This is in reference to one of the so-called double-ender boats which were constructed immediately after the Monitor had distinguished herself in wrecking the Merrimac. Contracts were let for building boats similar to the Monitor upon the slight information they then had. The boats, before in some cases even the keels were laid, were altered because the Monitor was found to be a failure in many respects. The first boat built under these contracts sank before it got out of sight of land. The consequence was that every one of the remaining boats had to be changed. Under the terms of agreement the contracts were let to parties who were to finish the vessels in from three to five months, as the case might be, or pay heavy forfeits. Then came the Government with new plans and new alterations and consequent delays. Because of this there was a largely increased expenditure. Then followed the so-called Selfridge board and the Marchand board, who reviewed the cases and found for the various amounts recommended as justly due these various builders. This is one of a class of cases desired to be sent to the Court of Claims for final adjudication.

Mr. HALE. I am very glad to get this information. There were cases of this kind that came over from the civil war where, undoubtedly, the contractors had good claims against the Government. These double-enders furnish instances of that kind. Congress has passed several bills that were sent to the Court of Claims, and several of them have been paid. This being one of those claims, I do not object to it because I know something about them.

I was afraid when I rose that this was one of a class of cases, which have arisen in the last five or six years, where contractors with the Navy Department for modern ships have not only got their contract money but have got immense premiums for increased speed, and are now clamoring at our doors for damages for detention and all the imaginable and ingenious things that can be got up by contractors, to which I am entirely opposed. If this were one of those cases, I certainly should insist upon my objection; but as it is not of that class, I do not object.

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator that the class of cases he speaks of will certainly receive very close scrutiny if they get to the Senate Committee on Claims.

Mr. HALE. I am sorry to say the committee has reported one or two cases that, so far as I am concerned, I will not if I can help it permit to go through.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. BATE. How much is involved in the bill?

Mr. WARREN. The Court of Claims will have to determine that. It may be $5,000 and it may be $20,000, but the Court of Claims will determine.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. COCKRELL. I want the papers presented by the Senator from Wyoming printed as a separate document, because we may have use for it.

Mr. WARREN. I ask that the papers which I send to the desk may be printed in the RECORD and also printed as a document.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That order will be made, in the absence of objection.

The papers referred to are as follows:

CERTAIN CLAIMS FOR EXTRA PAYMENTS FOR VESSELS BUILT FOR THE UNITED STATES NAVY.

At the commencement of the war, in April, 1861, the United States Government had only 89 vessels of all kinds, including ships of the line, frigates, sloops of war, brigs, steam sloops, etc., ranging from a tonnage of 566 tons in a sloop of war up to a tonnage of 4,580, the largest vessel in our Navy at that time.

At the breaking out of the war the vessels first built were screw sloops and gunboats. The first ironclad vessel constructed was the Monitor, which was turned over to the Government in March, 1862, followed the next month by the Galena.

From 1861 up to May, 1868, the Government built itself, and had built by different contractors, 179 vessels. Of this number 20 were light-draft monitors, of which the following is a history in part:

During the year 1862 the necessity for some light-draft armored vessels for operations on our Western rivers and the shallow bays and sounds upon the Atlantic and Gulf coasts became so urgent that the Navy Department determined to provide some for that purpose, if possible. Application was made to Mr. John Ericsson, the inventor of the original monitor, for a plan of a light-draft monitor, to carry one turret and to have a draft of from 6 to 6½ feet. On the 9th of October Mr. Ericsson submitted to the Department a plan, which, to use his words, was not intended as a working plan, yet it defined with clearness and precision the general principle and the mode of building the vessel, engines, boilers, and propeller.

Mr. Ericsson not having time to make all the calculations and detailed working plans, that work was confided to Chief Engineer Alban C. Stimers, of the United States Navy. Mr. Stimers had been engaged with Mr. Ericsson in the construction of the first monitor; had gone in that vessel in the capacity of engineer from New York to Hampton Roads; had there assisted in the contest between the Monitor and the rebel ironclad Merrimac, and since that time had been engaged more or less, by order of the Navy Department, in superintending the construction of the other monitors contracted for by the Department. The detailed plan having been prepared by Mr. Stimers, the Department advertised for proposals. * * *

From the bids thus received a general average price was established of a little less than $400,000 each, and during the months of March, April, and May, 1863, contracts were made for the building of 20 light-draft monitors upon the same plan. Mr. Stimers was placed in charge of their construction, and the contractors were directed to look to him for instructions. He was ordered to consult with Mr. Ericsson in preparing his plans and drawings for contractors, and, at his own request, was authorized to establish an office and employ assistants in New York City, where he could have facilities for frequent and easy consultation with Mr. Ericsson.

In May, 1864, the first of these vessels, the Chimo, built by Mr. Aquila Adams, was launched at Boston. She was found to be a failure, so far as the original design was concerned, of a light-draft river monitor. All these vessels having been designed upon the same plan, further work was at once suspended upon them. A commission was appointed on the 11th of June, 1864, to examine them and to recommend what should be done with them to remedy their defects.

The commission reported on the 9th of July, 1864, recommending that 5 of the vessels should be changed into torpedo boats by removing the turrets, etc., in order to lighten their draft, and that the other 15 should be changed by building up their sides 22 inches, increasing their draft, but rendering them more serviceable as monitors. That recommendation was adopted by the Department, and the proposed changes have been carried out.

These vessels were found to be defective in draft and in speed. Instead of being some 15 inches out of water when fully completed and equipped, as was the original design, it was found that they would barely float, their decks being awash with the water. Their speed, instead of being from 7 to 9 knots an hour, was found upon trial to be only from 3½ to 4 knots an hour.

The increased draft was caused, first, by reason of a miscalculation of the weights of the materials and the amount of displacement, and secondly, in consequence of the additions and alterations made in the plans after the contracts were entered into. Many of these alterations were considered necessary from the experience gained by the Navy in the attack made by the monitors and other vessels upon the rebel forts in the harbor of Charleston, and were adopted to obviate defects which that engagement showed to exist in the monitors.

When it was found that these vessels were failures as originally designed and constructed, Mr. Stimers was removed from the position he had held in relation to them, and they were placed in charge of other officers and altered as recommended by the commission appointed to examine them.

Because of these many changes, and others, and consequent extra cost of construction, the "Selfridge board" was organized in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of March 9, 1865, and the Secretary of the Navy, Gideon Welles, appointed Commodore Thomes O. Selfridge, Chief Engineer Montgomery Fletcher, and Paymaster Charles H. Eldredge.

The board commenced its session on the 5th of June, 1865, and adjourned December 23, 1865, having been in session one hundred and seventy-two days and examined the claims of 57 contractors. This board recommended to Congress the payment of $2,270,627.14. Of this amount Congress has since paid nearly $900,000. This board gave the claims before it very close scrutiny. The majority of the claims considered were for hulls and machinery of what were called wooden double enders.

These claims grew out of the hurry and confusion incident to the building of a navy during the war, and appear to be directly due to the fact that the Government was not prepared at the time the contracts were let to furnish specific plans of what it desired. The shipbuilders were seen by Mr. A. C. Stimers, who had charge of the bureau of construction in New York, and some of them, according to their testimony, were practically impressed into the service of accepting contracts upon such crude descriptions as Mr. Stimers could give them of what he wanted.

The Paul Jones was generally used by him as an illustration of what he would expect in the way of vessels, whereas it appears that in all cases of the vessels contracted for the machinery was heavier and more expensive than that of the Jones. In the case of the Peoria, for instance, the engines weighed nearly 600,000 pounds, while those of the Jones weighed only 380,000 pounds.

The delay, ranging from six months to eighteen months, caused by the Government's tardiness in furnishing plans and its persistence in changing its plans caused loss by virtue of the increase in the cost of labor and materials. These increased prices are dwelt upon in an affidavit made by the late John Roach when the claims first came before Congress, in which he said:

"The great scarcity of skilled mechanics, the disorganization of labor during and in consequence of the war, the giving out of so many contracts at the same time for steam machinery by the Government, and the chartering of so many steam vessels of all classes to be used in the Government service created a demand for skilled mechanics to meet which the ordinary supply was totally inadequate.

"Later this state of affairs was much aggravated by numbers of mechanics, induced by the heavy bounties, entering the volunteer service, others being conscripted or moving to distant localities to avoid conscription, many of the best workmen being absorbed by the Navy and navy-yards, others being attracted into avocations rendered by the war temporarily more lucrative than mechanical pursuits.

"Not only the cost of labor kept advancing through the whole time the work was in progress until it reached from 50 to 100 per cent above the rates paid at the time the contract was made, but owing to the great infusion of inexperienced hands its efficiency kept assteadily falling to a lower standard, taking much longer to build a pair of engines at that period than it had previously done with the same number of workmen at lower prices.

"This disorganization in the labor market affected the cost of work indirectly as well as directly, subcontractors in most instances failing to finish the articles contracted for at the time specified, and in many instances furnishing materials which, not coming up to the standard of quality, had to be condemned and replaced, causing much delay, unnecessary labor, and increase in cost.

"The enormous advance in the cost of all materials was in a great measure owing to the depreciation in value of paper money, caused by the extraordinary issue by the Government of an irredeemable currency. Pig iron rose while the work was in progress from $27 per ton in October, 1862, when the contract was made, to $80; boiler plate from 6¼ cents per pound to 10¼ cents; bar iron from $72.50 to $220 per ton; ingot copper from 25½ cents to 51¼ cents per pound; sheet copper from 30½ cents to 70 cents per pound."

Later on the "Marchand board" was organized under the act of March 2, 1867, with Commodore J. B. Marchand as president; Chief Engineer J. W. King and Paymaster Edward Foster as the other members of the board. They examined the claims of 48 contractors, were in session one hundred and twenty-three days, and had under consideration claims amounting to $10,184,592.50. They took no testimony and had no hearings, but found due different contractors for vessels built by them the sum of $225,988.56, which was paid by act of Congress approved July 13, 1868.

The Navy Department on August 6, 1869, appointed another board, called the "Boggs board," which examined the claims of one contractor and awarded him $93,116.98. This amount was an additional allowance to that made by the Marchand board to a contractor who had been awarded $115,539. That Congress has not considered the action of the Marchand board as final is evidenced by the following list of claims paid since that board was organized:

*This $93,000 was paid three years after Congress passed the act to pay the Secors $115,000.

In discussing claims of this character, Senator Sumner (see Congressional Globe, 1865, page 1892) said:

"The Senator from Kentucky said they took the war into their calculations. Perhaps they did; but who among these contractors could take that war adequately into his calculations? Who among those sitting here or at the other end of the avenue properly appreciated the character of the great contest that was then going on?

"Sir, we had passed half a century in peace; we knew nothing of war or of war preparations, when all at once we were called to efforts on this gigantic scale. Are you astonished that these contractors did not know more about the war than your statesmen? Be to these contractors as gentle in judgment and as considerate as you have been to others in public life who have erred in their calculations with regard to it.—Congressional Globe, page 1987.

"The building of that invulnerable Navy was one of the great victories of the war, not to be commemorated on any special field, but to be seen in those mighty results which we all now enjoy.

"And now, again, I ask, Are you ready to see these contractors who have done this service sacrificed? You do not allow the soldier to be sacrificed, nor the national creditor who has taken your stock; will you allow the mechanic to be sacrificed? * * * My friend on my right [Mr. Nye] asked you to be magnanimous to these contractors. I do not put it in that way. I ask you simply to be just. Do by them as you would be done by.

"The Senator from Nevada also very fitly reminded you of the experience of other countries. He told you that England, at the close of the Crimean war, when her mechanics had suffered precisely as your mechanics have suffered, did not allow them to be sacrificed, but every pound and shilling of their liabilities under their contracts was promptly met by that Government. Will you be less just to your mechanics than England? It is an old saying that 'Republics are ungrateful.' I hope that this Republic may certainly vie with any monarchy in gratitude to those who served it."—Congressional Globe, page 1987.

During the same debate Senator Hendricks, of Indiana (see Congressional Globe, page 1964, 1865), said:

"I am of the opinion that these sums ought to be paid, as a matter of justice and right, by the Government to these contractors. Each case, of course, has its special merits or demerits. But, sir, I believe in the doctrine that where a man contracts to do a great and very important work for the Government he ought not to be allowed to be a large loser, and, in some cases, as will be the result here, to be broken up by the contract that he may have made, and especially in the case of contracts made at such a time as these were made, and for such work as they were made. * * *

"We had to have these ships; the Government could not progress in the war without them, and great numbers had to be manufactured or contracted for about the same time. What was the effect of that? The Government made a contract with one man, then with another, then with another, and started her own shipyards with all the force it was possible to command. What was the effect of that? Of course, to increase the price of labor; of course, to increase the price of material required in the construction of the ships. There are some general views about the equity of these claims without reference to the particular merit of each case. (Congressional Globe, page 1890, 1866.)

"The point is that, these contracts being made in 1862 and 1863, the prices continued to advance during all the time that these parties were building the vessels and constructing the machinery for them, so that they were overtaken by this enormously high rate of prices and destroyed. (Congressional Globe, page 1892.)

"These contracts were made by some below their own propositions, and at barely fair prices at the then current rates. Is there any Senator here who wishes to see these men broken up merely because they entered into a contract with Government? Is there any Senator here who wishes to say to these men, 'We have your bond, and we will hold you to your bond; we will take the blood out of your business; we will have the pound of flesh?'" (Congressional Globe, page 1964.)

The following letter of Commodore B. F. Isherwood, written in 1887, contains a concise statement of the claims of contractors who constructed the light-draft monitors:

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 26, 1887.

DEAR SIR: I have the pleasure of acknowledging the receipt of your communication of the 22d instant, asking me to inform you of the causes of the alterations and changes in the plans of the light-draft monitors, constructed during the war for the Navy Department, and the causes of the delays in their construction, and whether these delays caused extra expense to the contractors.

In reply I would refer to the report on this subject made by the Hon. B. F. Wade, chairman of the Committee on the Conduct of the War, United States Senate, volume 3. From this report you will find that, although I was, as you state in your note above referred to, the Chief of the Bureau of Steam Engineering in the Navy Department during the war, I had nothing to do whatever with either the designing or the execution of the work for these monitors.

The Navy Department had established what was in effect a bureau for this purpose in New York City, and had placed Mr. Alfan C. Stimers at its head, with a large corps of assistant engineers, draftsmen, etc. The whole work, hulls and machinery, was entirely in his hands. He was absolutely untrammeled, being allowed carte blanche by the Department, and his acts and plans were never submitted to any other person.

The selection of Mr. Stimers by the Navy Department for this duty was most unfortunate. The selection was wholly the act of Mr. G. V. Fox, then the Assistant Secretary of the Navy, who had unbounded but misplaced confidence in Mr. Stimers's abilities. In making the appointment Mr. Fox did not consult either of the mechanical bureaus of the Navy Department, nor was Mr. Stimers's plans ever submitted to them.

The result, as is well known, was a most disastrous failure, due to the absolute and astonishing incapacity of Mr. Stimers, and to the fact of his selection by Mr. Fox without inquiry of the mechanical bureaus as to Mr. Stimers's qualifications. In a professional matter of which Mr. Fox had no knowledge, such a selection without careful investigation of Mr. Stimers's abilities was an act of temerity which in a measure made the Navy Department a party to the cause of failure.

At the commencement, then, Mr. Fox was responsible for a most injudicious selection for a most important position, and Mr. Stimers was responsible for the absurd blunders he committed, and as both represented the Government, the latter was to that extent justly responsible for their acts.

Under this system 20 vessels were built, all of which (they were exact duplicates) proved absolute failures, their only value being their worth as old material. The cost to the Government was about $8,000,000, and there was, in my opinion, a considerable loss borne by the contractors chargeable to the action of the Government and not yet compensated.

The contracts were taken at a round sum for a certain amount of work to be done in a certain time, conformably to drawings and specifications to be furnished by Mr. Stimers. The responsibilities of the contractors were limited to the quality of the materials and workmanship and to the completion of the vessels in the specified time. They were not at all concerned in the final success or failure of the vessels.

From the first the plans were continually changed and important modifications introduced, all in the direction of more expensive work and materials and requiring longer time for execution. This increased length of time involved greatly increased cost of the work of the contractors, owing to the daily and rapidly increasing rise, at that date, in the cost of materials and labor.

The war was then at its height, and the Government was in the market for the whole mechanical resources of the country, which were not able to meet the demand upon them, and, as a result, the price of certain materials and labor used in the construction of ships and machinery rose abnormally high above even the general increase of price. The loss due to this cause was of necessity borne by the contractors, and has never in any of the settlements made been taken into consideration.

Had the plans and specifications been delivered to the contractors at the date of the contract, so that they could have then made their purchases of materials, and had there been no changes in these plans and specifications, so that the work could have been prosecuted uninterruptedly to completion without the great delays unavoidable to such changes and alterations, it could have been executed in the contract time, and the contractors would have saved to themselves the rise in the price of materials and labor which took place during the extended time.

There must be here recalled that for the great extension of time in the completion of these contracts the Government alone was responsible by the changes, alterations, and additions it made to the work after the contracts were executed. This extension of time reacted upon the cost of the work as a whole, and, though the Government paid a certain sum for additional work, that sum was inadequate to cover the losses of the contractors by the rise in the cost of materials and labor used in the construction of the work done according to the original contract, and which was prolonged in consequence of the alterations and additions.

All that the Government paid for was the price of additional work at current rates, but the work as a whole could only progress together; that which was in accordance with the original contract had to wait until the additions and alterations could be completed, and in the meantime the cost of materials and labor was rising rapidly and enormously.

These delays, which no efforts of the contractors could prevent, and which were caused exclusively by the action of the Government, were ruinous to the contractors by reason of the continual rise of prices; materials and labor became every day scarcer and scarcer; the shops and plant of the contractors were occupied by the vessels that they could neither abandon nor complete. They could not, therefore, take other and remunerative work, and they had to keep a full force of workmen, for if they once lost them they could not at that time be recovered, so great was the demand.

Some approximation may be furnished of the losses sustained by the contractors from the action of the Government in departing from the original plans and specifications by additions and alterations involving great increase of time by estimating the cost to the contractors of the original work, had it been done in contract time, which would have been the case but for the interference of the Government, and the cost of the same work done in the extended time caused by the action of the Government, taking as the basis the average price of materials and labor in the two cases.

The additions and alterations referred to were due to the incapacity of Mr. Stimers to properly design such vessels. Without knowledge of how to proceed, he was constantly vacillating, doing and undoing; completed work was destroyed and other work substituted; time was lost between the notification to the contractors that other plans would be prepared in place of those already furnished and the reception of such plans.

In fact, the character of the vessels was essentially changed during their construction from the original programme; great delays were consequently necessarily experienced, and as the price of materials and labor was continually increasing, due to the continually increasing demand for the same caused by the war, the cost of executing the work, which was done according to the original contract, was much increased at the expense of the contractors.

Respectfully,

B. F. ISHERWOOD.

Hon. BENJAMIN BUTTERWORTH.

I certify the above is a true copy.

[SEAL.] WM. H. DAVIS,
Notary Public for New Jersey.

WYNN W. PEFLEY.

Mr. SHOUP. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (S. 2762) to authorize the Secretary of War to correct the military record of Wynn W. Pefley. It directs the Secretary of War to correct the military record of Wynn W. Pefley, late sergeant, Company H, First Idaho Infantry, so as to show that his height at the time of enlistment in said organization was 5 feet 10½ inches.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

APPRAISERS AT PHILADELPHIA AND BOSTON.

Mr. LODGE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 3286) to diminish the number of appraisers at the ports of Philadelphia and Boston.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, in line 8, before the word "thousand," to strike out "five" and insert "four;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That sections Nos. 2529 and 2544 of the Revised Statutes of the United States are hereby so amended that there shall be one appraiser of merchandise at each of said ports instead of two, as now provided by law.

The salary of said appraisers shall be $4,000 each per annum, instead of $3,000 each, as now established by law.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMERICAN REGISTER FOR STEAMSHIP GARONNE.

Mr. TURNER. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (S. 3465) to provide an American register for the steamship Garonne.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, in line 8, after the words "United States," to strike out:

Whenever it shall be shown to the Commissioner of Navigation that the repairs put upon such vessel in the United States are equal to three-fourths of the cost of such vessel when so repaired—

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioner of Navigation is hereby authorized and directed to cause the foreign-built steamship Garonne, owned by Charles Richardson, of Tacoma, State of Washington, and Frank Waterhouse, of Seattle, State of Washington, citizens of the United States, to be registered as a vessel of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LEVI STOLTZ.

Mr. FORAKER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 879) for the relief of Levi Stoltz.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, any statute of limitation to the contrary notwithstanding, to consider and adjust the claim of Levi Stoltz, a citizen of Greenville, Darke County, in the State of Ohio, in accordance with the provisions of section 6, act of March 1, 1879, as amended by subsequent acts, for excess of taxes and assessments charged by the United States against him prior to January 1, 1874, on the Greenville distillery, owned and operated by him, said excess of assessments caused by accidental bursting of the stills, necessary changes in the still tubs by errors in surveys, and to refund the amount of taxes that may be found to have been thus overcharged or allowable on account of accident; but the whole sum allowed shall not exceed the sum of $1,153.56.

Mr. CHANDLER. Is there a written report in that case?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that there is.

Mr. FORAKER. Yes; there is a report with the bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. From what committee and made by what Senator?

Mr. FORAKER. Made by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], from the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CHANDLER. What is the date of the report?

Mr. FORAKER. January 17, 1900.

Mr. CHANDLER. Does the Senator know the amount involved?

Mr. FORAKER. One thousand one hundred and fifty-three dollars and fifty-six cents. It has twice passed the Senate, I believe, and has been favorably reported in both Houses.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator's information is so accurate that I will not ask to have the report read.

Mr. FORAKER. I am much obliged to the Senator.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, April 14, 1900.

The House met at 12 o'clock m., and was called to order by the Clerk, Hon. ALEXANDER MCDOWELL, who read the following communication:

SPEAKER'S ROOM, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., April 14, 1900.

To the House of Representatives:

I hereby designate Hon. JOHN DALZELL, of Pennsylvania, to perform the duties of the Chair during the day, Saturday, April 14, 1900.

D. B. HENDERSON, Speaker.

Mr. DALZELL then took the Chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

USE OF TIMBER AND STONE IN THE INDIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. JETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 10665) to provide for the use of timber and stone for domestic and industrial purposes in the Indian Territory.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill, which the Clerk will report.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to prescribe rules and regulations for the procurement of timber and stone for such domestic and industrial purposes, to be used only in the Indian Territory, as in his judgment he shall deem necessary and proper, from lands belonging to either of the Five Civilized Tribes of Indians, and to fix the rates of royalty to be paid therefor, and collect the same for the benefit of said tribes; and every person who unlawfully cuts, or aids, or is employed in unlawfully cutting, or wantonly destroys, or procures to be wantonly destroyed, any timber standing upon the land of either of said tribes, contrary to the regulations prescribed by the Secretary, shall pay a fine of not more than $500, or be imprisoned not more than twelve months, or both, in the discretion of the court trying the same.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. JETT, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. JETT, the bill H. R. 5780, relating to the same subject, was ordered to lie on the table.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state, for the information of the House, that on Monday next I will call up the naval appropriation bill and ask for its consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois gives notice that on Monday next he will call up for consideration the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Before the gentleman states the arrangement for debate on that bill, I wish to say that I do not see the gentleman from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS], the ranking member of the committee on this side, in his seat, and I think it would be well enough for him to come in before that is stated.

Mr. FOSS. Very well; he can do that.

CORRECTION.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I desire to make a correction in the RECORD. On page 4137, the temporary Chairman, while the House was in Committee of the Whole, cited an authority. The full text of the authority, which is found on page 147 of Jefferson's Manual, is not given at length in the RECORD, and I will hand it to the Reporter to be printed as the full text of the authority cited by the Chair on yesterday.

The matter referred to is as follows:

It is equally an error to suppose that any member has a right, without a question put, to lay a book or paper on the table, and have it read, on suggesting that it contains matter infringing on the privileges of the House.—Ib.

For the same reason, a member has not a right to read a paper in his place, if it be objected to, without leave of the House. But this rigor is never exercised but where there is an intentional or gross abuse of the time and patience of the House.

A member has not a right even to read his own speech, committed to writing, without leave. This also is to prevent an abuse of time, and therefore is not refused but where that is intended.—2 Grey, 227.

PRIVATE PENSION BILLS PASSED.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Speaker, I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the consideration of the pension bills on which the previous question was ordered on yesterday.

On motion of Mr. SULLOWAY, a motion to reconsider the several votes by which the various bills had been passed was laid on the table.

HOUSE BILLS WITH SENATE AMENDMENTS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following House bills with Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were severally read, and, on motion of Mr. SULLOWAY, concurred in.

A bill (H. R. 1201) granting a pension to James McNutt;
A bill (H. R. 7264) granting a pension to Hannah C. Smith;
A bill (H. R. 6527) granting an increase of pension to George Myers; and
A bill (H. R. 2170) granting a pension to Angeline Eyestone.

FISH AND FISHERIES OF PORTO RICO.

Mr. HEATWOLE. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Printing to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution H. J. Res. 198.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 198) providing for the printing and distribution of the general report of the expedition of the steamer Fishhawk to Porto Rico, including the chapter relating to the fish and fisheries of Porto Rico, as contained in the Fish Commission Bulletin for 1900.

Resolved, etc., That there be printed and bound, under the direction of the Joint Committee on Printing, 15,000 copies of the general report of the expedition of the steamer Fishhawk to Porto Rico, including the chapter relating to the fish and fisheries of Porto Rico, as contained in the Fish Commission Bulletin for 1900; 9,000 for the use of the House, 3,000 for the use of the Senate, and 3,000 for the use of the United States Fish Commission.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman to give an explanation as to the amount of cost.

Mr. HEATWOLE. This work has reference to Porto Rican fish and fisheries. The work has not yet been completed, and the definite cost can not be given. If the resolution is not passed now, the lithographic stones will be destroyed and the illustrations would have to be reproduced, at considerable additional cost.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Do these books when published go to the folding room?

Mr. HEATWOLE. Yes.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE OF THE PRESIDENT TRANSMITTING THE TREATY OF PEACE WITH SPAIN.

Mr. HEATWOLE. Mr. Speaker, I am further directed by the Committee on Printing to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate concurrent resolution No. 19. I think, however, it is a privileged report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed and bound 20,000 copies of the message of the President transmitting the treaty of peace with Spain and the accompanying documents, in one volume, of which 13,000 copies shall be for the use of the House of Representatives and 7,000 copies for the use of the Senate.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

In line 2 of engrossed copy of resolution strike out the word "twenty" and insert "nine;" in line 6 strike out "thirteen" and insert "six;" and in line 7 strike out "seven" and insert "three."

So that it will read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed and bound 9,000 copies of the message of the President transmitting the treaty of peace with Spain and the accompanying documents, in one volume, of which 6,000 copies shall be for the use of the House of Representatives and 3,000 copies for the use of the Senate.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The concurrent resolution as amended was agreed to.

ANNUAL REPORT OF THE COMMISSION TO THE FIVE CIVILIZED TRIBES FOR 1899.

Mr. HEATWOLE. Mr. Speaker, I am further directed by the Committee on Printing to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the Senate concurrent resolution 41.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 2,500 additional copies of the annual report of the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, of which 250 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 500 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 1,750 copies for the use of the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would like to ask the gentleman from Minnesota what is the necessity for the additional number?

Mr. HEATWOLE. It is asked for by the Dawes Indian Commission, as well as by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. How many of the original were there printed?

Mr. HEATWOLE. One thousand, I understand.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. This increases it to double the number, does it not?

Mr. HEATWOLE. This is an addition to the regular number printed of 250 copies for the use of the Senate, 500 copies for the use of the House, and 1,750 copies for the use of the commission.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Is the report unanimous?

Mr. HEATWOLE. Yes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question was taken; and the concurrent resolution was agreed to.

HEARINGS ON HOUSE BILL 3353.

Mr. HEATWOLE. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Printing to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House resolution 119.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed of the hearings had before the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads on House bill 3353, including the text of the bill, 3,500 copies for the use of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HEATWOLE. Mr. Speaker, I will say that this is asked for by the Committee on Post Offices and Post-Roads.

The resolution was agreed to.

A PRIMER OF FORESTRY.

Mr. HEATWOLE. Mr. Speaker, I am further directed by the Committee on Printing to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate joint resolution 34.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution authorizing the printing of 35,000 copies of Bulletin No. 24, Department of Agriculture, entitled "A Primer of Forestry," for the use of Congress and the Department of Agriculture.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there be printed 35,000 copies of Bulletin

24 of the Division of Forestry of the Department of Agriculture, entitled "A Primer of Forestry;" 5,000 copies for the use of the Senate, 10,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 20,000 copies for the use of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would like to ask the gentleman if these pamphlets go to the credit of members in the folding room?

Mr. HEATWOLE. I understand so. All these publications for the use of the House and Senate should go to the folding room.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The resolution was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

PRELIMINARY EXAMINATION OF RESERVOIR SITES IN WYOMING AND COLORADO.

Mr. HEATWOLE. Mr. Speaker, I am further directed by the Committee on Printing to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate joint resolution No. 10, providing for the printing of 3,000 copies of House Document No. 141, relating to the preliminary examination of reservoir sites in Wyoming and Colorado.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That there be printed for the use of the Senate and House of Representatives 3,000 copies of House of Representatives Document No. 141, Fifty-fifth Congress, second session, being "Preliminary examination of reservoir sites in Wyoming and Colorado," 1,500 copies for the use of the Senate and 1,500 copies for the use of the House of Representatives.

With the following amendment:

In line 7 strike out all after the word "one" and insert "thousand copies for the use of the Senate and 2,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

FIELD OPERATIONS OF THE DIVISION OF SOILS.

Mr. HEATWOLE. Mr. Speaker, I am further directed by the Committee on Printing to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House concurrent resolution No. 31.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed from the stereotype plates now in the Government Printing Office an extra edition of —— thousand copies of Report No. 64, of the Department of Agriculture entitled "Field Operations of the Division of Soils in 1899;" —— thousand copies for distribution by Members and Delegates of the House of Representatives; —— thousand copies for distribution by Senators, and 10,000 copies for distribution by the Secretary of Agriculture.

With the following amendments recommended by the committee:

In line 4, before the word "thousand," insert "thirteen."
In line 7, before the word "thousand," insert "two."
In line 8, before the word "thousand," insert "one."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I would like to know where the demand for the publication of these documents comes from. The House has been doing a great deal lately in the matter of furnishing additional documents for distribution to farmers, and I would like to know if this publication is of practical use to the farmer. I wish some explanation from the gentleman on this matter. I do not think the Government Printing Office ought to be turned into a bureau for the dissemination of literature to farmers unless the printing thus issued is of practical value.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts object?

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the reason for this order and where the demand comes from for the distribution of these documents. I am in favor of every legitimate aid to the farmer, but I think it is due the House that the members should know the practical value of all documents printed and distributed at the expense of the Government.

Mr. HEATWOLE. I think, Mr. Speaker, it is proper that I should have the correspondence in relation to this matter read for the information of the House and the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The Clerk read as follows:

LETTER OF TRANSMITTAL.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., February 1, 1900.

MR. PRESIDENT: I have the honor to transmit a report of this Department upon the field operations of the Division of Soils during the year 1899. It covers not only the most important work of this Division, but, in my opinion, regarded in the light of the possible results of the information which has been secured thereby, the most important work of this character ever undertaken in any country.

It consists of an introduction by Prof. Milton Whitney, the Chief of the Division, and special reports on the various lines of field work by the scientific assistants of that Division in cooperation, in some instances, with educational institutions in various parts of the country. The report covers, altogether, a soil survey of an area of not less than 720,000 acres, scattered throughout the following regions: New Mexico, Utah, Colorado, and Connecticut. These accounts of soil surveys are followed by some valuable discussions on "The application of the theory of solutions to the study of soils," "Some necessary modifications in method of mechanical analysis as applied to alkali soils," and "Salts as influencing the rate of evaporation from soils."

It need hardly be said that it was found quite impossible to restrict this report within the limits of a hundred octavo pages, and consequently, under the operations of section 89, chapter 23, Volume XXVIII of the Statutes at Large, 1895, the Secretary of Agriculture has no authority to secure the printing of more than 1,000 copies, a number which would be entirely inadequate to supply our exchanges, our agricultural colleges and experiment stations, and the divisional list of the Division of Soils, to say nothing of any miscellaneous demand. In this case, moreover, the Department, in my opinion, is bound to supply copies of the report to the very large number of persons who have rendered efficient aid to our surveyors in their field work.

Under these circumstances and in view of the great importance of the subject covered, I have the honor to recommend that it be transmitted to Congress, together with the maps, illustrations, and diagrams accompanying, to be printed by order of that body, and I further recommend that not less than 10,000 copies be printed for the use of this Department, in addition to such number as Congress may order for the use of its members.

I have the honor to remain, Mr. President, very respectfully,
JAMES WILSON, Secretary.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
DIVISION OF PUBLICATIONS,
Washington, D. C., March 26, 1900.

DEAR SIR: We have received concurrent resolutions 31, 32, and 33, of the House of Representatives, all of which I see have been referred to your committee.

I inclose a copy of the letter of transmittal addressed by the Secretary to the President in forwarding the report covered by concurrent resolution 31. It will give you some information as to the importance of the subject covered and of the reason which impelled the Secretary to ask for 10,000 copies.

The reports covered by concurrent resolutions 32 and 33 are reports submitted in compliance with the law, and it has always been usual for Congress to print an extra number of copies of such reports for the use of this Department. You will notice that only 2,000 of each of these reports are asked for, the expense of which will be comparatively trifling.

In connection with this subject, may I be permitted to recall to your mind the fact that the Public Printer is earnestly desirous of an early passage of the resolution ordering 5,000 extra copies of the Yearbook for foreign use? Inasmuch as this edition will necessitate the preparation of another set of stereotype plates, the matter already set, of which there are now considerable over 400 pages, can not be distributed until the fate of that resolution is decided.

Yours, very truly,
GEO. WM. HILL.

Hon. JOEL P. HEATWOLE, M. C.,
House of Representatives.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Do I understand that the resolution offered by the gentleman from Minnesota just carries out the recommendations of the Secretary of Agriculture?

Mr. HEATWOLE. That is all.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Then I have no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the concurrent resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The amendments were agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

REPORT OF THE GOVERNOR OF ARIZONA.

Mr. HEATWOLE. Mr. Speaker, I am further directed by the Committee on Printing to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate joint resolution 108, providing for the printing of the Report of the Governor of Arizona for 1899.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Public Printer be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to print 4,000 additional copies of the Report of the Governor of Arizona for 1899, of which 1,000 copies shall be for the use of the Department of the Interior, 1,500 copies for distribution by the governor of Arizona, 500 copies for the use of the Senate, and 1,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman what the necessity is for the additional copies of a report of a governor of a Territory for distribution?

Mr. HEATWOLE. I will answer the gentleman by reading an extract from a letter of the Secretary of the Interior.

Under existing law only 1,000 copies of this report can be printed by the Department, which number is found altogether too small to meet the demands made on this office for the work. The report gives very full information about all important matters relating to the Territory, and is therefore of great interest, especially to persons who contemplate moving to that section of the country. It serves as a reply to many inquiries as to the conditions in the Territory and the advantages afforded immigrants.

It is not only asked for by the Secretary of the Interior, but by the governor of Arizona, and the cost is not very great.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The joint resolution was ordered to be read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

REPORT OF COMMISSION TO PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

Mr. BOREING. I am directed by the Committee on Printing to report back with a favorable recommendation the resolution which I send to the desk. I ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows concurrent resolution No. 27:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed for the use of the United States Commission to the Philippine Islands 1,500 copies of volume 1 of their report, recently submitted to the Senate by the President.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BOREING] that this resolution be immediately considered?

There was no objection.

The question being taken, the resolution was agreed to.

REPORT ON INDIAN SCHOOLS.

Mr. BOREING. I am also directed to report from the Committee on Printing another resolution, which I request may be read; and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The Clerk read concurrent resolution No. 28, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed for the use of the Department of the Interior, 1,000 extra copies of the Report of the Superintendent of Indian Schools for the year 1899.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky that the resolution just read be immediately considered?

There was no objection.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the resolution; which was adopted.

ABERCROMBIE'S EXPLORATION OF ALASKA.

Mr. BOREING. I am further directed to report back with an amendment concurrent resolution 18, which I send to the desk; and I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 5,000 copies of the Report of Capt. W. R. Abercrombie on the Copper River Exploration Expedition to Alaska, transmitted by the Secretary of War, of which 1,500 shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,500 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 1,000 for distribution by the War Department.

The amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the resolving words and insert:

"That there be printed 4,000 copies of the Report of Capt. W. R. Abercrombie on the Copper River Exploration Expedition to Alaska, transmitted by the Secretary of War, of which 1,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 1,000 copies for distribution by the War Department.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the resolution.

The amendment was agreed to; and the resolution as amended was adopted.

HISTORY OF LOUISIANA PURCHASE.

Mr. BOREING. I am also directed by the Committee on Printing to report back favorably concurrent resolution of the Senate No. 36. I ask that the resolution be immediately considered.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 4,500 copies of the work entitled "The Louisiana Purchase," by the honorable Commissioner of the General Land Office of the United States, 1,500 copies for the use of the Senate and 3,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. What is this document proposed to be printed?

Mr. BOREING. This is a proposition to print a work entitled The Louisiana Purchase, by the Commissioner of the General Land Office. There is great demand for the document.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Is this resolution reported by the Committee on Printing?

Mr. BOREING. It is a Senate concurrent resolution. It has been considered by the House Committee on Printing, who recommend that the House concur in it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Is it a unanimous report?

Mr. BOREING. Yes, sir.

Mr. HITT. Is not this an historic inquiry into the Northwestern region and its supposed relations to the Louisiana purchase?

Mr. BOREING. Yes, sir.

Mr. HITT. It is wholly devoted, I think, to the Oregon question.

Mr. LACEY. It is intended to correct the supposed history of our acquisitions in the Northwest. Commissioner Hermann has made a very careful compilation covering the whole question.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Is this a political report?

Mr. LACEY. Not at all; it is thoroughly historical.

Mr. BOREING. There is no politics in it.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I desire to offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

In lines 2 and 3 strike out "four thousand five hundred" and insert in lieu thereof "nine thousand."

In line 6 strike out "one thousand five hundred" and insert "three thousand."

In lines 7 and 8 strike out "three thousand" and insert "six thousand."

Mr. JONES of Washington. This is a matter in which there is a great deal of interest, especially among the people included in this section of country. The amendment which I offer is satisfactory to the committee, and I hope it will be agreed to by the House.

The amendment was agreed to; and the resolution as amended was adopted.

Mr. KNOX addressed the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman from Massachusetts rise?

Mr. KNOX. Simply to make inquiry for information whether all these documents, the printing of which we are authorizing, will go to the folding room to the credit of members.

Mr. BOREING. That is my understanding; they all go to the folding room.

Mr. Speaker, I move to reconsider the several votes by which the resolutions I have reported have been adopted, and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. HEATWOLE. I move to reconsider the votes by which the several resolutions reported by me from the Committee on Printing were adopted, and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COMMERCIAL AND INDUSTRIAL CONDITIONS—CHINA AND JAPAN.

Mr. LOVERING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1939) authorizing the President of the United States to appoint a commission to study and make full report of the commercial and industrial conditions of China and Japan, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be read, subject to the right of objection.

The bill was read at length.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to inquire if there is not a special order set for to-day at 1 o'clock?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made.

RECEPTION OF STATUE OF OLIVER P. MORTON.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Speaker, I call up the special order set for to-day at 1 o'clock.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the order of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

SATURDAY, April 14.

On motion of Mr. STEELE, by unanimous consent, it was ordered that Saturday, April 14, beginning at 1 o'clock, be set apart for addresses on the receipt of the statue of Hon. Oliver P. Morton. (Order made March 24.)

Mr. McCLEARY. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Committee on the Library, I desire to report back the concurrent resolution S. 37 with a favorable recommendation. The Committee on the Library, to whom was referred the resolution in question, has directed me to report it back with the recommendation that it do pass.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Minnesota presents a resolution, which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the statue of Oliver P. Morton presented by the State of Indiana, to be placed in Statuary Hall, is accepted in the name of the United States; and that the thanks of Congress be tendered the State for the contribution of the statue of one of the most eminent citizens and illustrious statesmen of the Republic.

Second. That a copy of these resolutions, suitably engrossed and duly authenticated, be transmitted to the governor of the State of Indiana.

Mr. STEELE. I call up for present consideration the resolutions which have just been read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Speaker, in 1864, soon after the completion of the present Hall of the House of Representatives, a law was enacted by Congress which contained the following provision:

And the President is authorized to invite all the States to provide and furnish statues, in marble or bronze, not exceeding two in number for each State, of deceased persons who have been citizens thereof and illustrious for their historic renown or for distinguished civil or military services, such as each State may deem to be worthy of this national commemoration; and when so furnished the same shall be placed in the old Hall of the House of Representatives in the Capitol of the United States, which is set apart, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the purpose herein indicated.

In compliance with this resolution we are about to accept, as a gift from the State of Indiana, a statue of her illustrious son, Oliver P. Morton.

Oliver P. Morton was born in the village of Salisbury, then the county seat of Wayne County, Ind., on August 4, 1823. He was of humble parentage, his father being a shoemaker. His mother died when he was but 14 years of age. He was then sent to live with his grandparents and aunts, and was afforded an opportunity to attend school one year. It is not recorded that he was considered brighter than his fellow-students, but he was already distinguished by persistence. At the age of 15 he undertook to learn the hatters' trade, which he no doubt intended should be his life pursuit. At this work he remained for four years. During this period he spent much time in reading, and employing every means possible to acquire information. Quitting his trade, he entered Miami University, at Oxford, Ohio. Here he industriously improved his opportunities, not studying, apparently, toward any particular end, but always more anxious to acquire knowledge than to display it. This was throughout his life one of his characteristics. He was a favorite member of his college society at Miami University and stood well among his fellows.

For want of means he was compelled to relinquish his college work. Returning to Centerville, Ind., he entered the office of Hon. John S. Newman, one of the well-known lawyers of our State at that time, and began the study of law. This was in 1845. In May of that year he married Miss Lucinda M. Burbank. That this alliance was greatly to his advantage throughout his career there can be no doubt. In 1847 he was admitted to the bar of Wayne County, which included in its membership some of the most prominent attorneys of Indiana. It is not surprising, therefore, that he did not leap immediately into prominence. He soon became known, however, as one of the profound lawyers of the circuit in which he resided.

As an evidence of the esteem in which he was held, it may be mentioned that in 1852, at the age of 29 years, he was appointed by the governor of the State to a vacancy on the circuit bench. This honorable position he filled with credit to himself and to the entire satisfaction of members of the bar. At the expiration of one year's service he declined an election to the bench, the duties not being to his liking. In spite of the reputation he had achieved he was not too proud, upon leaving the bench, to enter law school for the purpose of completing an education interrupted by the poverty of his earlier years.

In 1856 the People's Party of Indiana, comprising those who were opposed to the further extension of slavery, met in State convention. Oliver P. Morton, who had identified himself with the movement, was unanimously nominated for governor. While it was apparent that he could not be elected, he entered upon the canvass with that energy and zeal which had characterized him ever since reaching the age of maturity. His opponent was Hon. Ashbel P. Willard, one of the strongest among Democratic leaders, a successful politician, and a fluent speaker. At this time Morton had his reputation as a speaker yet to make. It was not a difficult matter, therefore, to arrange a joint canvass between the candidates. It had not proceeded far until the friends of Morton were entirely satisfied with the arrangement.

As a debater Morton did not indulge in any attempts at sharp practice. He made legitimate points, and elucidated them with a power of direct statement which carried conviction. He ignored every attempt on the part of his opponent to divert the attention of the audience from the vital issues by ridicule and catch phrases. From the first day of the canvass Morton's followers increased in number, and when the campaign closed, although Morton was defeated, he had laid the foundation for the political organization which carried the State four years later.

The campaign over, Morton returned to the practice of his profession. During the four years which followed his power as an organizer was manifested in the rapid growth of the Republican party in Indiana. In 1860 Morton and his friends, deferring to the age and experience of Henry S. Lane, consented to Morton's nomination for lieutenant-governor, with Lane as the head of the ticket.

Morton threw his whole strength into the momentous campaign of 1860. He was at this time in the prime of his physical strength. His competitor was Hon. David Turpie, an unusually strong man, and, in accordance with custom, a joint debate was arranged between these gentlemen. Their meetings were attended by great crowds, and Morton again manifested his exceptional ability as a debater. Stephen A. Douglas had given the Democratic party its shibboleth of "State sovereignty." Morton attacked this as a catch phrase designed to cover a hateful doctrine, and proved by close logic that Congress, and Congress alone, had the constitutional power to make needful rules and regulations for the Territories.

In a speech at Fort Wayne he said:

> The Territories are the property of the General Government, and the right to acquire them will not be disputed. Would the right to acquire, without the power to govern the thing acquired, be of any value? The right to govern, therefore, is an incident of the right to acquire. The Territories belong to all the people of the United States, and not to any particular part of them. They belong to them in their corporate, national, and governmental capacity. This being the case, how shall the people, the nation, express themselves or make manifest their wishes respecting their property, these Territories, excepting through Congress?

At the election the State was carried by the Republicans. Four days after Governor Lane was sworn in he was elected to the United States Senate, and Morton, assuming the governorship, took upon himself the heaviest responsibility devolving upon any man in the nation at that time, excepting only President Lincoln.

From the first he manifested the firmness and profound good sense necessary to the highest executive efficiency. He had attained a reputation as a lawyer and a politician, but while his friends had the fullest faith in his ability and integrity they had not anticipated that Morton would show a degree of executive ability in the crisis he was compelled to face which would stamp him as one of the great men of his time.

Governor Morton was among the first men of prominence in the Union, if not the first, to declare the position of the Republican party upon the question of secession, with which the result of the election of 1860 brought the country face to face. At a great ratification meeting held in Indianapolis on November 22, 1860, he declared in a memorable speech that "if the issue now before us was disunion or war," he was for war, and that he believed this was the position of the Republican party. "Grant the right of secession," he declared, "and the Union is dissolved." I will not stop to quote further from this great speech. It is enough to say that it was widely printed, and that it aroused the patriotic feeling of loyal people all over the North and brought Morton at once into national prominence as a patriot and a statesman.

He clearly foresaw the crisis which was approaching, and warned the people of Indiana and the country of its coming. After the inauguration of Mr. Lincoln he lost no time in visiting the President and holding a conference with him. Governor Morton was not surprised when, on April 12, 1861, the news was flashed over the country that Fort Sumter had been fired upon. On April 15 he telegraphed to the President offering 10,000 men for service in behalf of the Union. It was the first tender of volunteer troops which came to Abraham Lincoln. Under the leadership of Governor Morton, Indiana was one of the first States to put her soldiers in the field.

At this time there was less than $15,000 in the State treasury, and after our first quota of troops had been supplied with inferior arms and equipments we were practically without arms, supplies, or munitions of any kind, yet on the 20th of April, foreseeing the future needs of the Government, Governor Morton telegraphed the Secretary of War, offering six additional regiments, which he had already begun to organize and equip. Receiving no reply, on April 23 he sent a special messenger to Washington to renew the offer. From that day until the close of the war there was not a time in which he was not urging an increase of our forces or that he was not organizing and equipping regiments in Indiana in anticipation of additional demands. During the war Indiana sent over 208,000 soldiers to the front, a larger per capita representation in the field, it is said, than that of any other Northern State.

The legislature elected in 1862 refused to come to his assistance; on the contrary, sought in every way to embarrass him. His message to the legislature, which was considered one of the strongest ever submitted by a State executive, was treated with contempt, that body refusing to receive it. This legislature refused to provide the funds necessary for carrying on the great work of organizing and equipping troops. Morton was undaunted. A great sum of money was borrowed on his own personal account, individuals and counties all over the State advancing funds to meet the emergency.

Thus was the confidence of the people in Morton's integrity exemplified. That confidence was not misplaced. Every dollar passing through his hands, directly or indirectly, was satisfactorily accounted for. The best of everything that money could buy was furnished to our soldiers. In the estimation of Governor Morton, nothing was too good for the men who were fighting the battles of the Union. No man could have discharged his duty with greater courage, more untiring industry, or more lofty patriotism. In spite of the great responsibilities which weighed upon him at home, he found time to visit the Union armies, for the purpose of seeing for himself that Indiana soldiers were in no wise neglected. He was a familiar figure in camp, hospital, and field, wherever Indiana soldiers were to be found. He was frequently called to Washington for consultation with the President and Secretary of War.

At this time he was embarrassed at home by an unfriendly minority which opposed the prosecution of the war. There existed in Indiana an oath-bound conspiracy, which sought the establishment of a Northwest confederacy, the release of Confederate prisoners in Northern prisons, the overthrow of the State government by force, and even the assassination of Governor Morton. Its members were organized and drilled, and sought every opportunity to discourage enlistment and to encourage desertions from the Union ranks. I refer to this only for the purpose of showing the desperate situation Governor Morton was compelled to face. He thwarted the purposes of this organization by courage and vigilance. As we look back over those troublous times, it is with a feeling of gratitude that we had at the helm of state a man so strong and so resourceful.

It is not strange that Oliver P. Morton became known throughout the Union as "Indiana's great war governor." His readiness to supply troops for the protection of Kentucky from invasion gained for him the admiration of the people of that State.

George D. Prentice, the talented editor of the Louisville Journal, said of him:

He has been emphatically Kentucky's guardian spirit from the very commencement of the dangers that threatened her existence. Kentucky and the whole country owe him a large debt of gratitude. Oh, that all the public functionaries of the country were as vigilant, as clear-sighted, as energetic, as fearless, as chivalrous as he.

Mr. Charles Walker, author of an admirable sketch of The Life, Character, and Public Services of Oliver P. Morton, has well said that—

His heart was as full of sympathy as his head was of resources.

And that—

In every sense of the word he was the soldier's friend.

It is fair to the soldiers of Indiana that I should say that they thoroughly appreciated his watchful care and attention and that on every field of battle during that unhappy conflict they gave a good account of themselves. In the language of James A. Garfield—

On a hundred battlefields his name was the battle cry of the noble regiments he had organized and inspired with his own lofty spirit.

In 1864, at the age of 41, Morton was reelected governor, defeating Joseph E. McDonald, a strong and able man, who was not a sympathizer with the rebellion. Shortly after his election Morton's friends were alarmed by the first premonitions of the great physical affliction which afterwards overtook him, and one morning in the latter part of the summer of 1865 he awoke to find his lower limbs paralyzed. The best medical advice and treatment was sought and applied, but with no avail. In further search of relief he decided to visit Europe. Before his departure Hon. Joseph E. McDonald, his late competitor, and Hon. Samuel Buskirk, also a leading Democrat, introduced in the legislature then sitting resolutions commending Morton for his ability and integrity, which were passed without a dissenting vote.

In March, 1866, he returned from Europe, his condition unimproved. In that year a State legislature was to be elected, upon which devolved the duty of choosing a United States Senator. By the Republicans of Indiana it was taken by common consent that in case of Republican success Morton should be chosen. Notwithstanding his affliction, he made a thorough canvass of the State. His mental vigor seemed to have increased. The campaign was a memorable one, the Republicans were successful, and Morton was elected Senator by the unanimous vote of the Republican members of the general assembly.

On the 4th of March, 1867, he took his seat as Senator in a body numbering among its members many men distinguished for eminent public service and for unusual ability. It is sufficient to say that Morton was soon recognized as a leader among the great leaders of that body, which had to deal with the troublesome question of the reconstruction and rehabilitation of the Union. In spite of the bitterness of the conflict from which the country had just emerged, and in which Morton was a favorite target for assault, he brought to this work a spirit of kindness toward the South. In one of his speeches he said:

I am, from my heart, anxious for the complete restoration of the South, the upbuilding of her prosperity, and the reunion of all the States in sentiments of love for each other and devotion to our common country.

Senator Morton was a potent factor in the framing of the important legislation enacted during the period of his Congressional service. In spite of his great physical infirmity he was untiring in his industry and followed the subjects of legislation which came before Congress with sleepless vigilance. As a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations he was largely instrumental in bringing about the treaty with Great Britain under which the Alabama award was made. As an evidence of the esteem in which he was held by General Grant, it may be stated that he was tendered the British mission. The appointment was approved by the Republican press of the country and was a source of special pride to the people of Indiana, although they preferred that Morton should decline the appointment.

During the whole of General Grant's Administration he was the close friend and counselor of the President. In the Republican national convention of 1876 he was put forward by the Indiana delegation as a candidate for the Presidential nomination. It was readily seconded by many delegates from other States, notwithstanding his physical infirmities, except for which there was a general feeling that he might have been nominated.

He was a central figure in the complications which followed the disputed election of 1876. He opposed the authorization of the Electoral Commission, but upon its creation he was made a member of the body and carried to that work the same vigilant industry which had characterized his whole career.

With the completion of the work of that commission Senator Morton's connection with public life practically ceased. In the summer of 1877 he made a trip to the Pacific coast, where another attack of that dreadful malady, paralysis, overtook him. He insisted on starting home at once. He was depressed but patient during the long return trip. After reaching Indiana he lived for some weeks, during which time the President of the United States journeyed to his bedside to express his sympathy and hope for his recovery. But it was a struggle in which even the physical and moral strength of Morton could not conquer. On November 1, 1877, he died, his last words being, "I am dying; I am worn out."

He was at the time of his death but 54 years of age. Indiana lost in him her most eminent statesman, the country one of its wisest counselors, and the Republican party of our State its greatest leader. None has arisen to fully fill his place.

It is a source of satisfaction to the people of our State, especially to those of us who were more or less on the active stage of life during the troublous period in which Morton achieved his fame, to be able to record that twenty years after the death of Governor Morton the general assembly of the State of Indiana, composed for the most part of men who were unborn when the war of the rebellion was begun and who were but lads when Morton died, passed a resolution authorizing the governor of the State to appoint a commission to procure a statue of Indiana's great war governor, to be placed in Statuary Hall, thus recognizing him as a man "illustrious for his historic renown, for distinguished service to the State," and as "most worthy of national commemoration."

As citizens of Indiana, we are proud to know that through the years to come the statue of Oliver P. Morton will stand in that great hall among those of the illustrious men of other States, an evidence of our supreme appreciation of his great and glorious service to the State and nation.

He was a courageous patriot, a loyal friend, an honest man. [Applause.]

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, as a representative of the State of Indiana, I take pleasure in adding my voice to those raised in reverential commemoration of the man whom my State has by honoring honored herself and the nation of which she is a part. The voiceless marble now placed in Statuary Hall will honor that sculptured room as did the living being whose form is thus preserved honor the upper house of the National Legislature.

Oliver Perry Morton was one of those men whose conditions and environment gave the strength which makes them great, and renders time necessary to bring out their truly admirable qualities without the view being marred by personal or sectional hatred. Oliver Perry Morton was a great man when living, but even a greater man when viewed by the historian. His was a life of turmoil and conflict; his mind rose superior to the ravages of disease and the irritation of constant and excruciating pain. Severe lines were drawn in his face by the pain he suffered, and men, looking only at the face, thought him austere. Those who really knew the man, and not merely his outward semblance, loved him. His heart was as big as his brain, and few, if any, men have been blessed with greater intellects.

His life was gentle, and the elements
So mix'd in him, that Nature might stand up
And say to all the world, "This was a man."

Oliver Perry Morton came of old New England stock, his ancestors emigrating to this country with Roger Williams. His father was one of the hardy pioneers who opened up the fertile prairies of the West. At the little town of Salisbury, Wayne County, Ind., Oliver Perry Morton was born on the 4th of August, 1823. At an early age he was apprenticed to his brother to learn the hatter's trade. After learning the trade he studied law, and so prominent was his legal acumen and his forensic ability that at the age of 29 years he was placed upon the circuit bench, and there his decisions were marked with such a thorough grasp of law and such a sense of exact and clear justice that he became at once a prominent figure in the councils of his State.

He was elected lieutenant-governor of Indiana in 1860, and upon the elevation of Governor Henry S. Lane to the United States Senate Oliver Perry Morton, at the age of 38 years, became governor of the State of Indiana. He was elected to this office in 1864, and resigned to accept the position of United States Senator in 1867, which position he filled twelve years. In 1876 he received the second largest vote as a candidate for the Presidential nomination at the hands of the Republican party. It was as the "war governor" of Indiana that he won the admiration of the entire nation. He was essentially an executive.

An eye like Mars, to threaten and command;
A station like the herald Mercury
New-lighted on a heaven-kissing hill—
A combination and a form indeed,
Where every god did seem to set his seal,
To give the world assurance of a man.

He worked day and night, and kept peace within the borders of his State when it seemed impossible that there could be peace. When he was stricken with paralysis, the entire nation mourned. It was supposed that never again could his voice be heard in counsel; but while he could no longer walk, or even stand, and although every moment brought intense pain, for eleven years the great mind arose superior to the wrecked body, and until the day of his death Oliver Perry Morton did a prodigious work in the United States Senate and throughout the State of Indiana in personally caring for the interests of his constituents. He at times seemed merciless toward the Southern States—the friends of Sumner thought him unkind—but Oliver Perry Morton always intended to be just.

No friend ever went to him and found an ear deaf or a heart closed to his appeals. He was strong in his convictions, but when convinced that he was wrong he always acknowledged it and proceeded to repair the wrong. His life was one of constant criticism and censure; he made strong friends and bitter enemies.

He arose superior to all strife—

> Like some tall cliff that lifts its awful face,
> Swells from the vale, and midway leaves the scene,
> Though round its breast the rolling clouds are spread,
> Eternal sunshine settles on its head.

Now that sectional hatred has died away and the bitter prejudice born of the conditions of the sixties are no longer felt, we can look back upon the life and record of Oliver Perry Morton, and while we regret that the conditions of his time made him violent in some of his methods, yet we can see clearly, as could not be seen in those dark days, that when Oliver Perry Morton's soul left the body which had so long been an incumbrance to it that one of the best and greatest men had passed from the visible present to the invisible future.

His services to his State and his nation will live forever in history, while the enmities which he engendered have already been buried.

Indiana, in placing this statue in the halls of the National Capitol, honors herself and honors the nation rather than Oliver Perry Morton, for his memory will live without the aid of sculptor's chisel. Could Oliver Perry Morton, free from pain, have lived his allotted three score years and ten, no one can tell what the nation would have profited by his counsels.

Why this great man should have been so hampered by physical infirmity and his brain racked by intense pain is one of those mysterious problems which men can not solve. Oliver Perry Morton is dead, but—

> Death is another life. We bow our heads
> At going out, we think, and enter straight
> Another golden chamber of the King's,
> Larger than this we leave and lovelier,
> And then, in shadowy glimpses disconnect,
> The story, flower-like, closes thus its leaves.

[Applause.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I shall not attempt to speak upon the character and personal characteristics of Oliver P. Morton. My presence here on this occasion is due to a fact which I will state, and which I presume no other man in the capital at Washington can state. I refer to my acquaintance with Mr. Morton and an incident of the early days of the party in Indiana.

Oliver P. Morton was a Democrat, as I was. He was born ten years before I was, but had I voted in 1853 I should have voted the Democratic ticket. As I was not old enough to vote until 1854, I began with the Republican party.

In the spring of 1854 I went to Indiana and settled at Lafayette, intending to make it my home; so that under the statute of that State I was entitled to vote at the end of six months. I went to Indiana a Democratic boy; but without going into any considerable detail it is enough to say a complete revolution in the public sentiment of this country took place at about that period of time.

Those of us who had hoped the better judgment of the Democratic party would prevail over the proslavery tendencies of the party were disappointed. The action of the Democratic Administration in the matter of the contest in Kansas and Nebraska between freedom and slavery disappointed us; and so it happened that a great political revolution took place, and it swept over Indiana in that year. The breaking up of the Whig party and the natural antagonism to the Democratic party had produced a number of political organizations; among others, a strong Temperance party and also the Knownothing party; and then the opposition to the attitude of the Democratic party in Congress upon the subject of the Kansas and Nebraska difficulties took the form, not only in Indiana but in other States, of an anti-Lecompton or anti-Nebraska party—a coming together of all shades and forms of opinions.

Morton was a Democrat, as I said, and his attitude at that time was a matter of speculation in Indiana. On the 13th of July, 1854, I went with a great concourse of people to a mass convention of all the elements in opposition to the then regular Democratic party. It was held at Indianapolis. It was presided over by Bishop Ames, of the Methodist Church, and as we are recording history, it might be well for me to give the reason why he appeared on that occasion and presided in that convention.

An attack had been made upon the Methodist preachers of Indiana by the then United States marshal, and among other epithets that he applied to them he called them "itinerating vagabonds." That aroused the sentiment of the Methodist Church, and there came to Indianapolis a great host of Methodist preachers, Methodists, and all sorts of people; and in order to emphasize the positions of things Bishop Ames was called upon to preside, and made a speech. I remember it as though it were but yesterday. It was strong, eloquent, and full of the fire of the old-time Methodist preacher.

It was in that convention, of which I was a member, that Oliver P. Morton first publicly made known his retirement from the Democratic party and his entry into the party in opposition. The Democrats in that day called the opposition party the Abolition, Free Soil, Maine Law, Native American, Anti-Catholic, Anti-Nebraska party of Indiana. I copied this name from a history of Mr. Morton himself, and nearly all of those names are very familiar to me, because we heard them in the course of the campaign very often. They were repeated with variations.

That was the break that Morton made, and he followed it up, and there was this characteristic of him: Indiana at that time had an October election, as Ohio did, and within a very few days following the October election he began a campaign, and made a great speech in the city of Indianapolis in the latter part of October immediately following. He entered upon a war against the proslavery tendencies of the Democratic party, and he never ceased his battle. Defeat did not dismay him.

I was not personally familiar with him afterwards. I met him several times during one of the great campaigns in Indiana, and had the honor of speaking with him at two or three places about 1872. I considered him the most available, the most powerful, and the most effective stump orator in the United States. He was not a man of great eloquence, but he was a man who had the power of statement beyond almost any man that I ever heard speak. I saw him last in 1876 and 1877, and heard him last as he made a speech from the balcony of the Ebbitt House, in this city, when, in a rapid and wonderfully powerful speech, he reviewed the whole of the troubles about the electoral count; and he stood there, as he always did stand forth, as the greatest leader and the greatest exponent of the principles of his party that we had in the United States. This was after the Electoral Commission had decided for Hayes. I believe that it was Morton who gave more shape and more potentiality to the principles of the Republican party in its formative days and in its days of triumph than any other man in the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, the characters of truly great men suffer no more by being viewed from a distance than the beauty of a mountain when observed from a point which fails to disclose the smaller hills. Oliver Perry Morton was truly a great man, and throughout all time will be known as the idol of the Indiana soldiery, the trusted friend of Lincoln, and an essential part of the forces which constituted the support of the Government in the time of its greatest peril and the formative period, in which was shaped and established the policies of the reunited States. Whatever traits of character he may have possessed which commended him in the lesser walks of life, and received the approval of admiring friends who came in close contact with his everyday affairs, will be lost sight of in contemplating the larger and more prominent characteristics, which brought him into bold relief at a time when great events stirred the nation and strong men trembled under the burden of their responsibilities.

Left motherless at 4 years of age, he was deprived of those earlier influences which can spring only from a mother's care. Unfavored by either wealth, position, or name, he was to battle single-handed and alone with those obstacles which always press upon him who is educated in the school of adversity. Inheriting strong traits of mind from his English ancestry, he devoted himself to study with a persistency, courage, and patience which never wavered under his indomitable will. The discipline of both body and mind, occasioned by his necessities, became in after years the bulwark of his nature. He who succeeds in the school of adversity learns confidence and self-respect, which always prove great aids in contests where principles are involved. His education for and early practice in the law, while followed but a brief time, yet served to strengthen his powers of logic and debate, which proved so valuable to him in his efforts in the Senate of the United States, where, from his entrance until the close of his service, he ranked as the foremost debater and one to be reckoned with in all of the discussions which grew out of the great questions that then commanded the attention of Congress.

In some mysterious way, which has always been the subject of controversy and never satisfactorily settled, men seem to come forth on every great occasion peculiarly fitted and equipped for special services which are essential to success within the time in which they live. The war of the rebellion brought forth Oliver P. Morton and developed his opportunity. It is as the great war governor that he is best known and loved. Speculation as to how successfully he might have filled different positions, either civil or military, in the period in which he lived would be interesting, because his was a nature which seemed to possess those traits which might have shown equally brilliant in battle or powerful in peace.

He seemed to possess the patient persistency of Cromwell and the indomitable loyalty to principle which moved Martin Luther. His constant vigil, complete grasp of detail, incessant investigation of the actions of his enemies developed a courage which was certainly possessed in no higher degree by any general who faced the cannon of the rebellion. He who could with intrepid spirit and undaunted and unwavering courage thwart the insidious attacks of the Knights of the Golden Circle investing his own State and, under cover of darkness and deceit, intriguing against a Commonwealth whose honor and good name he was upholding would have commanded with credit at the Bloody Angle or with bravery have repelled the charge of Pickett at Gettysburg. His methods strongly portrayed military characteristics.

As an organizer Morton was unequaled. Anticipating the wants of the Government, he acted with a promptness which inspired confidence, and became an example to stimulate tardy spirits in other States. The quick responses with which he met the calls of the President soon made him one of the President's councilors, and he thereby became one of the men who shaped the policies of the nation. The completeness of his conduct in following the troops of his State after their enlistment, and administering to their wants when stricken in the field, made permanent his place in their hearts and added glory and renown to the State he served. Where opportunity afforded, and especially in the earlier part of the war, he made personal visits to the fields of battle where Indiana regiments had met with losses. At all times his volunteer force of physicians afforded quick and effective relief to the soldiers of his State, who, inspired by his conduct and patriotism, had poured out their blood upon Southern fields.

The promptness and universal practice of sending aid and equipment to the soldiers in the field established affection and confidence, not only among the soldiers of our State, but builded for Morton a reputation among all the soldiers who observed this treatment, which, in my judgment, is one of the most valuable and beautiful elements of a character which seems so full of grandeur. I remember having been told by one of the volunteer physicians sent into the field by Morton that, passing through the hospital among the wounded soldiers in search of those of Indiana regiments who had suffered injuries, he overheard a wounded soldier of another State whisper to a comrade in equal distress, "There goes one of Morton's men, caring for the Indiana boys."

Through this practice of humanity, spreading his kindly and generous spirit over the battlefields bathed with the blood of the soldiery of his State, he broadened the scope of his influence and inspired hearts from other States which beat in unison with those of the men his agents sought to succor. The kindliness of his character manifested in such action, the unselfishness of his disposition in the consideration of the needs of others, and the honesty of his purpose in rendering every possible aid to all who were laboring for the same cause constituted the strength of his nature.

Morton brought to bear upon the great purposes, the accomplishment of which even Lincoln did not more greatly cherish, every faculty and fiber of his nature, and yielded to the duty every element of his strength. His opportunity for good was increased by reason of the division of sentiment in his own State. The greater the opportunity, the greater the success, and Morton's success was quite commensurate with his opportunity.

"Grit is the grain of character. It may generally be described as heroism materialized—spirit and will thrust into heart, brain, and backbone, so as to form part of the physical substance of the man." The writer of that truth might well have had Oliver P. Morton in mind.

It is rarely given to one to demonstrate great strength and success in more than one field. Yet the success with which Morton managed the affairs of state while governor of Indiana, organized, equipped, and cared for more than 200,000 soldiers in the field, seems little greater than the success which he met as a Senator from that great State during the period immediately following the war, within which the great questions of reconstruction and the establishment of policies growing out of the war were considered and determined. He brought to bear upon those great questions the same spirit of loyalty, candid expression, sound logic, and courageous conduct that characterized his actions during the war.

Through all of the period from the time he took his courageous stand for the Union and assumed the charge of affairs of his native State until his untimely death he was the recognized and accepted leader of his party in the State, the successful champion of the principles which dominated his party in the nation, and one of the few men who were always to be considered in the framing of policies which affected the perpetuity of the Government. Time has cast no cloud upon his memory nor darkened a single spot upon his record. History will ever record him as one of the great men of the nation, possessing a character which has appeared in every movement for the formation of States or in the preservation of the true and essential principles of government. Linking his destiny with that of the Union, he became the rivet which made secure the position of his State, and has earned in full measure the honor his State to-day accords him. [Applause.]

Mr. GRIFFITH. Mr. Speaker, without any reference to the issues of party politics, either present or past, I desire to take an humble part in these proceedings.

When I was a young man, taking my first lessons in politics, the leader of the opposing party in my State was Oliver Perry Morton. During his lifetime he was most ardently admired by those of his own political faith and greatly feared by men of opposing views. While he was a man who had strong friends, there was probably no man in the United States who provoked more bitter criticism than did Oliver P. Morton. The opposition came not only from without his party, but also from within it. The mind of Oliver P. Morton, while not at all times great enough to rise above all prejudice, was yet so great that he could stand practically alone in his own party upon the monetary question and yet continue to be the acknowledged leader of that party.

Oliver P. Morton while living was, in a sense, a disturbing element as well as a quieting one. His mind was never in repose, and it was impossible for his contemporaries to view him calmly and dispassionately. He was a man of strong likes and dislikes. He was either overloved or overdisliked. He had strong friends and bitter enemies. He has now been dead for a little more than twenty years, and he is now known as he was never known during his active, turbulent life. Looking back through the shadows of the years that have gone, Republicans and Democrats alike can see the real character of the man, and there are no longer any diverse opinions as to the manner of man he was. We trace him back to his early ancestor, Roger Williams, and we find that he inherited an indomitable will, a force of intellect, and a bravery which nothing could deter. He was a born leader, and in whatever sphere of action he moved he molded both thought and action.

We find him among the quiet Quakers of Wayne County as a boy, and we find that the records of the church show that he was a leader there; he was a leader among the young men when he worked upon a hatter's bench as an apprentice. When not yet 30 years of age he was one of the leading jurists of his State. His course as governor of Indiana during the civil war was one of the most interesting features of the history of our country during that period, and he and Governor Curtin, of Pennsylvania, were recognized as the great war governors.

At the close of the civil war, when a stroke of paralysis completely wrecked his physical being, it was supposed, even by his friends, that his public work was done. It had in reality but commenced. The eleven years of life which his strong will power wrested from the grasp of death were eleven years of constant work and increasing activity. Wheeled from place to place, in the Senate of the United States, in national conventions, in public halls throughout the country, Oliver P. Morton held the people as few men have ever held them. And in his wrecked physical condition, with death seeming ever near, he came within a few votes of being nominated for the Presidency by the Republican party.

Mr. Speaker, old prejudices are forgotten. The sound of hasty words has died away. We can view Oliver P. Morton as he really was, and Democrats can unite with Republicans to-day in doing homage to that iron will and great intellect which assisted to restore order out of chaos in Indiana, and assisted in guiding the ship of state safely through the most stormy waters it ever encountered.

Mr. Speaker, I am glad, as a member of the Democratic party, proud of its history and loving its principles, to stand upon this floor as a Representative from the State of Indiana and testify to the love which the people of my State bear for the memory of the man whom they have selected as worthy of a place in Statuary Hall.

Indiana is entitled to thus honor but two of her sons.

Indiana has been prolific in great men. She has produced men who have occupied higher positions than did Oliver P. Morton. She has produced great authors, great jurists, great warriors, and great statesmen; and it is no idle compliment for me to say that the record of Oliver P. Morton justified his State in thus honoring his memory.

Oliver P. Morton and Thomas A. Hendricks were contemporaries. While Morton was always aggressive and forceful, Hendricks was equally effective by reason of being conservative and persuasive.

When the statue of Hendricks is placed alongside that of Morton the citizens of Indiana will have honored two favorite sons that in their day typified the highest character of American citizenship, and by whose efforts the growth and development of our State was such that Indiana to-day honors herself by these exercises. [Applause.]

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Speaker, the State of Indiana offers to the United States of America a tribute to her most admired son. She wishes that in sculptured marble a form of Oliver Perry Morton shall remain in Statuary Hall in order that it may prove an inspiration to all succeeding generations for truth, patriotism, and force of character. The man whom Indiana thus delights to honor was probably the most feared and the most admired man of his time. A staunch Democrat up to the time that the question of slavery shook this nation from center to circumference, he became one of the early leaders of the Republican party and can be truthfully termed one of its founders.

He was a natural leader. During his boyhood, in the little town of Salisbury, Ind., when working as a hatter's apprentice; and, when not yet 30 years of age, on the circuit bench, and in every other department of life, he showed himself a master. When the elevation of Henry S. Lane to the United States Senate caused Oliver Perry Morton, then lieutenant-governor, to become governor of the State of Indiana, he found that State in the throes of insurrection which threatened to bring about its dissolution. Strong men discussed the situation in every county in the State, and none could suggest a solution of the problem which confronted him.

At the popular election the people did not indorse the administration. The legislature was about to overturn the State government. The Republican members of the legislature withdrew, leaving that body without a quorum. The legislature dispersed and was not called together again. The supreme court of the State refused to uphold the governor. Without a legislature, without any appropriations, without funds with which to carry on the State government, and with the courts opposed to him, Oliver Perry Morton undertook to raise troops for the National Government and to restore peace and quiet at home. This caused a plot for his assassination. The governor had arrested the leaders of the plot, some of them of great power and prominence, and he was not assassinated.

Viewed from our standpoint nearly forty years after this condition of affairs has happily ceased, it seems almost impossible for any man to have successfully contended against the difficulties which surrounded Oliver Perry Morton during those four years as governor of Indiana. At that time he did not have a friend who believed that he could succeed. He practically never slept. So intense was the strain that after it was over and there was once more peace the great war governor of Indiana was stricken with paralysis, which left him a physical wreck. Notwithstanding the pain he suffered, his mind rose so superior to his body that, hopeless cripple though he was, he was elected to the United States Senate and was there the leader of his party. He was a member of the Electoral Commission, and he had received the second largest vote for the Presidential nomination in the Republican convention of 1876.

After the war was over it may seem to the student of history that Governor Morton was somewhat severe in his dealings with the Southern States. But whether that be true or not, it is certain that those four years, when he had the entire responsibility of the executive, the legislative, and the judicial departments of the State government of Indiana, he must have suffered so much that he could not well be otherwise than extreme in his views.

He lived in times of turmoil and was never allowed to rest. He was loved by many, he was feared by many, he was respected by all. Now that the questions which divided the nation are happily settled and the bitterness has all passed away, we can look upon the character of Oliver P. Morton calmly and dispassionately. I believe that I but voice the conviction of every man that Oliver P. Morton was the greatest executive that any State of the Union ever placed in the gubernatorial chair. His mind was strong, his will power absolutely inflexible. He had no weaknesses which affected his intellect. Those who were most violent in their opposition to the man when he was living are among the most ardent in their admiration of his character as viewed in the light of memory.

His statue placed in Statuary Hall will teach the youth of America to be true, to be strong, and to be patriotic.

His counsels were not heeded by the majority of the people of Indiana when he was their governor. They refused to sustain his administration at the polls. And yet if a list of fifty of Indiana's gifted sons should be presented to the people of Indiana to-day from which to make a choice as to whose memory to honor in Statuary Hall, I believe that the name of Oliver P. Morton would lead all the rest.

I do not believe there is a citizen of Indiana who is not proud that the statue of the great war governor is placed in the National Capitol. I believe that those whom he fought so earnestly—and it may be said at times so severely—unite with us to-day in admiration of the man who, single-handed and alone, could conduct the entire affairs of the State under the circumstances which attended his administration from 1861 to 1865.

Mr. Speaker, in the name of the State of Indiana I unite my voice with the voices of my colleagues in presenting the statue of her greatest son to perpetuate his memory in the Capitol of the United States, where his living presence once exerted so powerful an influence. [Applause.]

Mr. BRICK. Mr. Speaker, a great State, renowned in him, to-day answers to the call of the United States, and presents to the whole country he served so well, the statue of Oliver P. Morton, placed in her national hall of heroes, there to be reverently guarded so long as adamant endures and memory wakes.

The man who was known as the great war governor of Indiana, peerless among all the magistrates of those mighty days, requires no other tribute than the simple statement of that giant fact.

And this monument need not be erected for his sake; but we plant it there for his country's sake.

The noblest sentiment of any land is the debt it pays, in its richest excess of tenderest memory, bestowed on honored dead.

How poor and desolate this world would be without its monumental grave, without the quickening conscience of its remembered great!

And so to-day, after more than twenty years of days, with cumulative tense, the public grief bows homage to his name and lays upon his tomb a laurel wreath of glory.

Greatness lies in nobility of mind and goodness of heart, as well as in illustrious deeds.

And Oliver P. Morton lived the brief day that nature spares to man, but that day of his was fuller filled with deeds than hours, with palpitating thoughts than dial marks.

His name comes down to us radiant with a land redeemed, jeweled with the joys of hope, and shining bright and clear in a people reunited, where every man reveres the flag and not one wears a manacle.

This is a generation when kings and conquerors die and naught remains but speechless dust; the end of all is six feet of earth—so spoke Napoleon.

A day when love of man and country confers a prouder name, a grander title than all the glory found in war's grim pageantry of crimsoned conquest.

A day when earth's immortal crown is placed on heads that think—whose proudest epaulets of honor adorn the arm that works—whose most immemorial badge of heraldry reclines on breasts where hearts have felt.

Napoleon spoke better than he knew—wiser than he thought.

To the man who wears the borrowed plumes of ancestry or sports the fading livery of favoritism, the grave ends all.

To the warrior whose sordid ambition may have changed the map of nations, to the soldier whose glory clings round the crown of a destroyer, "the end of all is six feet of earth."

But to the patriot, to the constructor, to the empire builder, to one who learned from mother's lips and father's face and breathed it in from the very air of native soil that his first and last duty was to his country; that to live for her is honor and to die for her is glory—to such a man as Oliver P. Morton—for him to die was to just begin to live.

No widows or orphans were made for him, no tears were shed for his glory.

But his grave is watered by the dews of gratitude and lighted by the stars of a nation's love.

History is like the sibyl; she reveals her secrets leaf by leaf. Time and events solve what no prophet dare forecast.

The price of eminence is a cross and a crown.

To be great is to be maligned, to be misunderstood, to live amidst the curses of the present, and to die in the blessings of the future.

Living, he was a rival; dead, a benefactor.

The grave and mother earth cleanses all.

The man they called a demagogue is now known as a patriot. He whom they called a tyrant, history tells us was a man hurricane battling for the life of a nation—his country—the only true Republic that ever lived.

The man they thought a politician, the sage of events reveals to have been an inspired statesman with a soul and a message.

He delivered that message, and in the realm of time it has become a star that gleams and shines on the crowds of countless waves that ebb and flow in human life and round about the Ship of State.

Oliver Perry Morton was born of rugged mold, fresh from the soil, a native Indianian. Sooner or later the stock of all great men must be rejuvenated from the soil.

He came from the Middle West at a time when mighty, elemental forces were evolving within her.

She had not the proud heritage of New York; neither did she possess the polish of Boston; but she did have the smoke and fire and dust out of which worlds are made and swing into orbit.

And it was from such soil and in this air and sky in which he grew.

In the very heart of that land where in his day the battle of ages was begun, he awoke to the contest like a sleeping giant.

He continued that contest, a great blast furnace, with the brain of a Jove, with the courage of a Titan, and the heart of a mother, until that afternoon when he kissed his wife and sons to say, "I am worn out." These were his last words.

But the task was finished, and Morton's life work was over.

He was the foremost man in all the nation to maintain the Union. He lived long enough to perpetuate for all time the results of the war.

This was enough for one man to do.

He is Indiana's greatest son.

Who shall say to what degree he is great among the nation's heroes? There are no degrees in masterpieces.

There is one thing we know—that in one way and another they have all reached those sublime heights of human greatness to which God descends and man ascends.

There he will remain.

His were the days of rock and bronze, of decks wet with blood and men black with trials.

Days of crises and ominous hope for human liberty.

Days filled with the dread music of preparation and impending suspense—music mingled with the muttered roll of thunders and the crash of empire.

They demanded a Colossus, and in Oliver P. Morton was found a Thor.

A nation was to be saved, and there was no time for argument. No disturbing doubt of vacillating ethics swerved his mind when the issues were so vast and the field a kingdom.

Guns were to be bought, an army to be raised, and men to be cared for.

He was first of all the Union to telegraph Lincoln: "On behalf of the State of Indiana, I tender to you for the defense of the nation ten thousand men."

That was the message of his birth. He filled it with two hundred thousand men and all the days and hours of his life.

It was a message of blood and iron.

To-day it stands a granite statue—an imperishable name.

From that moment he became a god of war, and the arm he raised remained aloft till it nerveless fell in death, "worn out" in his country's cause.

He brooked no opposition, he spurned all compromise.

He had but one passion, his country; but one principle, its salvation, now and forever.

To him firmness was mercy, to bend a crime.

The Union was more sacred than even human blood, than his own life.

And so he lived, a giant oak, but around his rugged breast there twined all the vines and flowers of manly love, the love of home and country, of wife and child and friend.

We will not trespass here on old remembered days of long ago, when love and joy had mingled into wedded bliss upon the happy hearth of home, nor tell of days when hand in hand they wandered down the shadowy slope in self-forgetting rapture.

There is a love too great for utterance, a grief too strong for sentiment.

No soldier ever had a truer friend, no nation a better soldier.

When they left him for the battlefield his hand clasped every man's—a brother; as they fought in the carnage of conflict, with hearts of oak and nerves of steel, he was their comrade, and in the night of pain and death his ministering hand was always there, with tearful eye—their nurse and friend.

And then, when over all the blue and the gray, the smoke roll'ed away forever, he was the good father of every widow and orphan; he kept green the graves of the dead, and gave honor and relief to the living.

As some one said, in many a humble home where his picture was suspended by the side of the young soldier fallen, the message that the "good governor" had ceased to live would bring sadness as if death had again broken that family circle and once more had chilled the fires of the family hearthstone.

There came to the executive office at Indianapolis two old Quaker friends of Governor Morton, to get from his own lips news from the front. When they heard his words, and looked into that great, solemn countenance saddened by the love of menaced liberty, and tear-stained by the agony of the boys in blue, the eldest one, a man of seventy years or more, reverently placed his hands on Morton's head, and with simple pathos invoked God's providence with "May God bless you, Governor Morton."

Many a soldier has echoed that prayer; the nation has reiterated it.

And, Mr. Speaker, it must be so; God has blessed you, Governor Morton. [Applause.]

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, attracted by the generous salary of an Indiana school, I became the citizen of a State whose admiration for its war governor was unlimited either by tradition or political affiliation. It mattered not under what circumstances or from what section one came, whether as a soldier who had shared the material blessings of another State executive, or as a son of New England whose ideal of a war governor had developed under the burning zeal and crowning ability of John A. Andrew, he had only to study the history of Indiana to appreciate that the work of Governor Morton, under conditions confronted in no other Northern State, entitled him to the immortal fame of the Greek hero who lived for the glory of Athens.

During the closing years of Governor Morton's life it was my good fortune to know him somewhat intimately. I met him for the first time in 1871. Fifty or more gentlemen, representing a dozen counties of Indiana, were introduced to him in the reception room at the White House, and, after a brief interview, he led the way to the Cabinet room, where, without hesitation, and apparently without the slightest mental effort, he presented each one of us by name to President Grant, mentioning some pleasant incident suggested in the previous brief conversation. At first this familiarity created no surprise, but after twenty or thirty had been treated in the same courteous manner, making each one feel that he was a gentleman of some consequence in his locality, I became deeply interested in observing the work of such a remarkable memory.

He met us as strangers; he left us his friends. It was enough that we caught his smile; that we heard his voice mellowed into tenderness; that we looked into his face, full of tremendous determination, but softened by eyes twinkling with good nature. No wonder that old men revered, that middle age admired, and that the young loved him.

"How to win friends and keep them," says Mr. Forney, "is the secret of a successful public man." Senator Morton possessed this gift in large measure—not, perhaps, in the same form as that of Henry Clay, whose charms of unrivaled eloquence, of commanding presence, and of great personal magnetism drew men to him in spite of their previous prejudices, but because back of his recognized ability there were strict integrity, high honor, a generous nature, and a smile that illuminated the simplicity and sincerity of his life. "Did you ever see Senator Morton smile?" asked President Garfield of Mr. Schurz. "No man is arrogant who carries a heart so warm and generous that it creates such an expression. To me his smile is a benediction."

He easily met common men on a common level, because he sprung from the ranks of common people. Among those classed as great intellectually he was the peer of the ablest, with all of whom he mingled with ease and confidence. Thus he was perfectly at home with whatever class of men he happened to be thrown, winning some by sympathy, others by his friendly manner, and all by the superiority of his mind.

Senator Morton regretted that his early opportunities for obtaining such an education as cultivates and refines had been so limited. His education, although sufficient for most purposes, had been obtained under adverse circumstances, and for the most part after he was 20 years of age. Prior to that he knew little of the choice associations and refinements which give finish and gloss to scholarship. While Sumner was associating with Justice Story and the cultured men of Boston, Morton was serving at the trade of hatter and using such moments for reading and study as he could catch in the evenings and early mornings.

What others gain in youth and young manhood he was compelled to learn amidst the activities and bustle of a wonderfully busy life; but nature richly endowed him with those qualities of head and heart which, when once their roots touch a sympathetic soil, spring quickly into notice, attracting the most scholarly and refined. It is conceded that the sickness beginning in 1865 mellowed and enriched his nature, and that his greatest intellectual growth was reached after he entered the United States Senate.

He became strongly attached to Senator Sumner almost immediately upon taking his seat. Of all his associates in the Senate he spoke of him most frequently. The similarity of their views respecting President Johnson drew them together very early after he entered that body, the attachment being greatly strengthened by their service upon the Committee on Foreign Relations and by their efforts to secure the passage and ratification of the fifteenth amendment; but their friendship was based upon something more than the mere interest which springs up between men who meet often or are engaged in a common cause. They were very much alike in many respects.

In sincerity, inflexibility of purpose, dislike of cant, and unflinching fidelity to principle as he saw it, regardless of the men who stood in the way, Senator Morton resembled Mr. Sumner more nearly than any other of the latter's associates. Mr. Sumner's courage to express his convictions upon all occasions and under all circumstances won the Senator's admiration no less than his own fearlessness won the admiration of Mr. Sumner. Neither of them knew the feeling of fear in the performance of duty. Had Morton stood in Sumner's place in 1856, he would no doubt have arraigned the slave power with all the severity of his Masonic Hall speech in 1856, even though warned, as Mr. Sumner had been by Mrs. Seward, that such statements would lead to an assault.

But there were other reasons why these distinguished men, apparently so unlike, were very close friends. Senator Morton appreciated the scholarly character and attainments of Mr. Sumner, not so much because they made him preeminent in a body distinguished for its able men, but because something in his own nature was aroused and satisfied by this contact with the highest type of refinement and culture. "My pleasantest relations were with Sumner," he once said to me. "His information came from the Brights and the Cobdens of a nation, and he patiently sought the honor of his country through peace, believing that the views of such men would in the end prevail."

It is not unlikely that these long and friendly relations aided Senator Morton in assisting to bring to a successful termination the vexed questions that grew out of the depredations of the pirate Alabama. If ever there was good cause for war between the two great English-speaking nations, it was given in the cruel and inexcusable part which England then played.

Senator Morton shared the indignation of the American people, and was ready with argument and precedent to show that England must pay or fight; but he never lost the even temper or the patient ear or the generous hope that the better English sentiment would finally control. President Grant recognized his fitness to represent our Government during this trying ordeal by the offer of the English mission; but Morton was a born Senator of the true Roman type. His place was in the United States Senate, and he declined the flattering compliment with thanks.

A year or two after Mr. Sumner's death I asked the Senator why he did not take the chairmanship of the Committee on Foreign Relations. "It is not the committee that makes the chairman," he replied; "everybody knew of the Committee on Foreign Relations because Mr. Sumner lifted it into great prominence, but we hear little of it to-day, and few people know who is its present chairman."

But they knew who was chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections after his investigation of the charge that Senator Caldwell, of Kansas, had procured his election by the corrupt use of money. Caldwell was a Republican, a man of influence, possessed of many powerful friends and an excellent family. The strongest influences were brought to bear in his behalf. Men argued and threatened, newspapers criticised and lampooned, and old friends begged, pleading extenuating circumstances; but the chairman, always patient and courteous, was immovable. Senator Morton recommended his expulsion, and Mr. Caldwell escaped only by resignation.

Governor Morton was a great worker. It has been well said of him that "he was never idle when out of the bed, and often spent the dark hours of the night in thought." His attention to details and his ability to carry them in mind from month to month placed him in this respect by the side of the greatest generals in the field. In 1862 he organized the "General Military Agency of Indiana," whose duty it was to contribute to the welfare of Indiana troops, establishing fourteen subagencies in as many different cities throughout the East, South, and West. To supply the means to carry on this work he created the "Indiana Sanitary Commission," with auxiliary societies in every county. Under his personal direction the whole State became a supply camp, contributing in money and supplies over four and a half million dollars.

"In all our armies from Kansas to the Potomac, wherever I have met Indiana troops," writes the well-known correspondent of the New York Tribune, Mr. A. D. Richardson, "I have encountered some officers of Governor Morton going about among them inquiring as to their needs in camp and in hospital and performing those thousand offices the soldier so often requires." He once told me that he kept informed of the location, movement, condition, and strength of each of Indiana's 163 regiments and could call by name most of their commissioned officers.

After the war his attention to the details of party organization was no less thorough. He frequently met the prominent men of the State to obtain their views on public questions and to express his own. I recall several hurried trips from Washington to Indianapolis—one in 1872, another in 1873, and, again, another in 1874—that were concluded before the press was aware he had been out of Washington. He took nothing for granted. It must be positive knowledge, or he had no use for the information. A rumor or report, if of sufficient importance to be heeded at all, must be carefully run down and its truth or falsity known. "I had rather hear a man say it than have him write it," was a frequent saying, "for then I can search his mind."

I have heard it said that he was not a reader. This probably grew out of the fact that he was seldom seen reading. At home he was ever ready to receive callers, and in Washington he seemed always leading in debate or counseling in committee. When he found time to read was a mystery, yet Mr. Spofford, of the Congressional Library, is authority for the statement that Mr. Sumner, General Garfield, and Governor Morton were the three great users of books. He seemed able, as it has been said of Sir William Hamilton, "to tear the entrails from book or paper by a glance and forever to retain their contents." Yet if a book treated of suffering or oppression, except historically, he avoided it. He once told me that he had never finished The Scarlet Letter.

I have referred to the Senator's remarkable memory. He seemed never to forget anything. In the preparation of a speech he needed no index, but called for volume after volume, turning readily to the page, and rarely finding occasion to correct his dictation. In opening the campaign in 1876 he felt obliged to criticise at some length and with severity the public acts of Governor Hendricks, who had then been placed in nomination for Vice-President. His speech was dictated in three or four mornings while lying in bed, without opportunity for reference either to books or pamphlets, but not a single correction needed to be made.

It was interesting to watch his intellection, whether speaking or dictating. One could almost see his mind work as he paused between sentences, apparently pondering the best manner to express the next thought; but when the words came they fell from his lips beaten into such clear, finished sentences that change was afterwards rarely made. "He cared little for the mere graces of speech," said General Garfield, "but few men have been so greatly endowed with the power of clear statement and unassailable argument. The path of his thought was straight, like that of the swift cannon ball, shattering that it may reach, and shattering what it reaches."

Senator Reverdy Johnson said that Morton's first speech in the United States Senate, delivered in January, 1868, recalled the great speeches of Webster and Calhoun. General Grant declared that it settled the question of reconstruction.

His speeches were a library of political information, full of compact statement of apt illustration, and glistening with facts that were impregnable. He grasped and simplified every question, driving home his points with a power and often with an eloquence that never failed to hold audiences as long as he would talk to them. Whatever he said at once became of importance.

In politics Senator Morton was a master. He was not made to follow. Possessing the qualities that make a great leader, fertility of resource, boldness without rashness, aggressiveness without violence, alertness without irritating suspicions, with unerring judgment and a bulldog determination, he was admittedly one of the most consummate political leaders of his time. Circumstances gave him a most tremendous power, additional to the forces bequeathed him by nature. As the great war governor, whose head and heart were large enough to include every soldier and soldier's family, and the welfare of every charitable institution of the State, whether supported by legislative appropriation or not, the foundations of his influence became deeply embedded in the affections of the people.

How genuine and general was this attachment only those could fully appreciate who had been with him about the State. The people's greetings were not of the formal or usual character, but deeply earnest and affectionate. The loud huzzas were frequently hushed into whispered "God bless you;" the crowd, eager to take his hand, pressed about him as if some accident had happened and all were curious to see, while scores of women, dressed in black and holding their little ones by the hand, waited patiently on the outskirts until the way was cleared for them to reach him. To such a man, so loved and trusted and honored, the right to lead was cheerfully granted by the many, doubted by few, and successfully disputed by none.

He was not easily moved from his settled purposes, nor ready quickly to overlook the temerity of those who assumed to question his authority or to thwart his plans; but he controlled by the force of intellect, supported by a dominating will, by tremendous energy, by attention to the smallest details, and by the respect and love of the people.

Judge Headley, of Cincinnati, one of the ablest lawyers of the Ohio Valley, but opposed to Governor Morton politically, said of him that "he seemed incapable of deceit or disguise, but conducted his political warfare in the boldest and most direct and manly style."

On one occasion he was informed that a gentleman—long since dead, but at that time a very prominent and able member of the Indianapolis bar; erratic, perhaps, at times, but one of those large-hearted, generous, impulsive men whom most men respected and no one disliked—proposed standing for the legislature for the avowed purpose of defeating the Governor's reelection to the United States Senate.

"I hope he will do it," replied the Senator with emphasis. "That will give the people an opportunity to say whom they favor." Then, seizing his cane and stalking across the room, he exclaimed: "If he does it, I will canvass every school district in Marion County. Tell him to run and then throw open the schoolhouses and churches that the people may hear us."

That is neither the talk nor the way of a boss. He did not turn to the star chamber or to caucus. No henchmen were called in and instructions given them to find out his backers and see that by fair means or foul their names did not appear among the delegates who were to nominate a candidate for the State senate. His appeal was directly to the people. "Come and hear us, and then judge ye whether ye be for your old war governor or against him!" Had they met in the political arena, he must have trampled down his opponent like a charge of cavalry; not, however, in a manner to give personal offense, for the speeches of none of the great political leaders of the century were freer from personal abuse.

He belonged to a class of statesmen whose methods and ways were illuminated by unselfish patriotism, and whose leadership was gladly accepted, because, like guideposts, it directed from principle to principle, and always ended in victory and peace. Chase, of Ohio, Seward, of New York, Sumner and Andrew, of Massachusetts, Fessenden, of Maine, belonged in this glorious galaxy. They made platforms, they outlined principles, they blazed the way for a new party which should stand for freedom and Union. They were leaders because God made them great and noble, and men instinctively recognized their right to lead.

In studying the biographies of these men I have often compared their early struggles, the obstacles in the way of success, the assistance and encouragement received, and the fierce opposition encountered. It is certain they would have been recognized as great leaders wherever their lot had been cast; but whether another could have accomplished as much under the trying circumstances which faced Governor Morton throughout the war may be well doubted. The bitterness with which he was assailed by the enemies of the Union belongs to the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, rather than to the nineteenth. It was not criticism; it was brutal personal abuse, often as coarse and cruel as the bludgeon wielded in the hands of a would-be murderer. State pride, recognition of great services and great abilities, nothing seemed sufficient to restrain or soften those terrible assaults.

Yet he gave them little or no heed. Although reviled, he reviled not again. Certainly these assaults did not in the slightest weaken his purposes to sustain the Union and bring confusion to its enemies, whether at home or in the South. Mr. Lincoln is quoted as saying: "If I were called upon to name the civilian who had rendered the greatest service to the Government under the greatest difficulties, I should unhesitatingly name Governor Morton."

One of the crowning glories that characterized his political leadership was fidelity to friends. It was charged that he carried this too far. The same charge was preferred against General Grant. I do not deny that there was some reason for the criticism; but it is a glorious fault. Unswerving devotion to principle always goes hand in hand with fidelity to friends. These traits have a common origin, springing from a good conscience, supported by firmness, warmed by active sympathies, and guided by intelligence. Senator Morton could not have been so true to principle and less constant to friends. Who can imagine General Washington casting off Hamilton because of the clamor against him? When Mr. Lincoln put his arms about the neck of Secretary Chase, asking him to withdraw his resignation and remain in the Cabinet, it was an exhibition of the same fidelity that struck off the shackles from 4,000,000 slaves.

It is only when we meet in history the false-hearted, the weak, the fickle, the designing, or the wickedly ambitious that we hear the cry of Wolsey:

> Had I but served my God with half the zeal
> I served my king, he would not in mine age
> Have left me naked to mine enemies.

I have said that Governor Morton never finished the "Scarlet Letter." This sensitiveness to suffering, either mental or physical, permeated his everyday life, his one continued, sustained effort as governor being to ameliorate as far as possible the horrors and sufferings of war.

When Pericles was dying, the principal men of Athens, supposing him beyond the power of hearing, spoke in his presence of his many victories and trophies; but the great statesman and warrior, still clutching the sense of hearing and of speech, kindly chided them for extolling what fortune had assisted his doing. "Say rather that no Athenian, through my means, ever put on mourning." The great war governor of Indiana could have said the same with equal truth.

He did not always receive credit for such tenderness and sympathy. His tremendous energy, his ceaseless activity, his fearless arraignment of the opposition, his terrible denunciation of atrocities practiced in the South by Ku Klux and White Cap, and his apparent insensibility to criticism, however brutal and drastic, created an impression tha the was severe and vindictive and by nature cold and coarse. On the contrary, he was as tender and gentle and affectionate as a Sydney.

The great work of the Indiana sanitary commission had its inception in his active sympathies, and his eloquent and earnest efforts for freedom found their origin in his deeply seated hatred of wrong and his profound sympathy for the oppressed. He delighted in doing good to others. When a returning regiment suddenly appeared in Indianapolis and found the rain leaking through the roof of the barracks in Military Park he ordered it into the statehouse and threw open the doors of his own office for its comfort. Learning at the War Department in Washington that one of his regiments had been ordered East, he telegraphed the mayor of Cincinnati to have ready for them "a good, warm, home supper" as they passed through that city.

His home life was ideal. The wish of one was the desire of all. Never cloud shadowed it nor frown chilled it. Sickness might invade it, disappointment might enter it, severe pain, endless and unremitting, might smite it, and calumny, coarse, brutal, and persistent, might pound and clamor at its doors; but the peace, the love, the good-night kisses, and the happy morning greetings of that united and joyous household were never interrupted or disturbed.

It was my privilege to remain often at the bedside of the great statesman during the last two months of his life. The pain, the long, stifled groans, the intense suffering, the pleading tenderness of his voice, weakened to soft whispers, wrung tears from the stoutest hearts; but there was no impatience, no peevish repining, no words of bitterness or of regret. The coming of a friend illuminated the agonized face as quickly as the sun, bursting through threatening clouds, floods a landscape with its golden beams.

To the end his room was headquarters and his life the center of a nation's thought. There came to him the representatives of States and the head of the American commonwealth; each day loving and tender solicitude clicked its messages from far-off friends by the Golden Gate and along the Columbia and Willamette; the flowers which bloomed in the valleys of the Tennessee and the Cumberland came as a morning salutation from the faithful Uncle Toms and the sorrowing Topsies; the silver-tongued and silver-haired orator whose eloquent words had been heard on every stump in the land and whose voice was only recently hushed in death sat often by the bedside, holding in his the withered hand that he had strengthened and sustained; and when at last came the feeble and final words, "I am worn out," they fell upon the ears of the learned and loving physician to whose memory came the words of Longfellow to Mr. Sumner:

> Good night, good night, as we so oft have said,
> Beneath this roof at midnight, in the days
> That are no more and shall no more return.
> Thou hast but taken thy lamp and gone to bed;
> I stay a little longer, as one stays
> To cover up the embers that still burn.

[Applause.]

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, Oliver P. Morton attained to manhood's estate at a time in the history of the country when the greatest issue that ever engaged the thought of the Republic was rapidly reaching an acute stage in its development. Dialectics and parliamentary skill reached the climax of their development in the Federal Congress in the historical and often acrimonious contests over the slavery question. The "irrepressible conflict" had already reached the stage of all-absorbing interest, and the forces were reconnoitering for advantage in the final conflict. The slave interests were represented in all branches of the Government and in party councils by as able and courageous statesmen and as skillful parliamentarians as ever stood in defense of any cause in any country.

Every measure proposed, every policy suggested, was rigidly scrutinized to discover its bearing upon the "peculiar institution," compared with which every other interest was dwarfed into insignificance. Its advocates viewed with apprehension and astonishment the rapid growth of the free States and the development of institutions inherently antagonistic to slavery. Compromise after compromise had been effected in the hope that the troublesome question would be entirely eliminated from political controversy, but it would break out again with increased fury upon the slightest provocation.

Political ambition, party fealty, and commercial conservatism could not suppress it. Politicians endeavored to placate, but succeeded only in tiding over an immediate emergency, to witness a volcanic outburst at an unlooked-for point. The question was fundamental, and political empiricism could only palliate—could only serve to postpone to a remoter date the inevitable crisis.

Morton belonged to the Democratic party, the dominating influence of which was committed at all hazards to the protection of the interests of slavery. That unhallowed system was so interwoven into the social and industrial life of the Southern States that almost every law of general application affected it in some degree, and it was a source of increasing irritation between the North and the South and was rapidly becoming a positive menace to the Union. The growth of antagonistic sentiment in the North was as resistless as the tides of the ocean and as involuntary as the sweep of the storm. The Democratic party was the best organized and the most powerful party the Republic had yet seen. The interests of slavery controlled that party, and the party controlled the destinies of the country.

Slavery became aggressive and demanded new territory to preserve its political equilibrium, and Northern politicians submitted to the demand as far as they could without positively offending Northern sentiment. They became apologists for, rather than defenders of, that institution, and they were fortified in their positions by trade—obsequious, truckling trade—while the opposition was poorly organized and without discipline. But its motive was conscience and its purpose humanity.

This was the situation in the middle fifties when Oliver P. Morton renounced allegiance to the Democratic party, the only party that held out any hope to his personal ambition, and allied himself with a movement to create a new organization out of the dismembered fragments of the opposition upon the proposition that slavery should not be carried into new fields.

He was possessed of an intense nature and human ambitions, but he was a man of powerful convictions. Viewed from his standpoint, the change of party allegiance was a sublime sacrifice of ambition to principle, an act worthy of the noblest character in all history. The world loves to honor those lofty spirits whose life powers were dedicated to the cause of human liberty.

Morton was a giant physically, morally, and intellectually, and was led only by an overmastering sense of duty. Like a mighty leviathan of the sea, he came forth as the great champion of human rights, and his thunderous voice was heard all over the land. He was a veritable Joshua, attacking the walls of slavery's Jericho with the bugle blasts of his ponderous eloquence. He loved the truth for the truth's sake, and he was the most conspicuous and influential of all that splendid galaxy of statesmen of his time, who placed duty above party and joined the holy cause of freedom.

As an orator, as governor of Indiana, as a Senator in Congress, as an adviser in the councils of his party, he was an ardent and consistent advocate of human equality. He never abandoned a principle or forgot a friend. He was as loyal to his convictions as the needle to the pole. He sought public office only because it would enlarge his field for usefulness. He would scorn to subvert a public trust to personal ends.

His nature was rugged, his ideals noble, his methods practical. He knew human nature as it was, and made the highest and best use of its weaknesses as well as its virtues. He had confidence in himself, and he never disappointed his own hopes nor the expectations of his countrymen.

His forensic feats were those of a mighty gladiator whose weapons were an intense passion for his country and the ponderous trip-hammer of eloquent logic. He became a Republican at the organization of that party, and to say that he was not a strong partisan would belie his heroic nature. He loved his party because he saw in it a potent agency for the betterment of his country. He indorsed and approved party methods only to make it a more effective agency for doing good; but he never compromised a truth nor sacrificed a principle to gain temporary party advantage.

He had no patience with demagogues or timeservers. He was a leader of men whose commission came from on high and whose credentials were never called into question. He looked not for pathways in which to tread, but with unerring instinct he followed the light of truth as it was revealed to him, whithersoever it led.

To such noble characters the world is indebted for the establishment and preservation of the Republic.

Morton was actively identified with the momentous issues of the civil war, and President Lincoln had no more loyal supporter than he. He was in deed as in name Indiana's "great war governor," whose indomitable will found a way to accomplish its every purpose. He was largely instrumental in shaping the troublesome reconstruction legislation following the war. No Senator was heard with more respect or spoke to greater purpose.

His life is a splendid contribution to that glorious list of illustrious statesmen and patriots who controlled the destinies of the Republic in the greatest crisis of its history. We may pay respect to his memory by the beautiful statue in yonder hall, the tribute of affection of the great State whose interests he served so well, but his influence will be felt in free institutions and his fame will dwell in the hearts of a free people long after that elegant piece of chiseled stone shall have crumbled into dust. [Applause.]

Mr. FARIS. Mr. Speaker, the name of Oliver P. Morton stands without a peer among the sons of Indiana. The annals of his time furnish an ample record of his signal achievements, and my colleagues have suitably recalled them to-day. It does not detract from his fame as a Senator to say that the people of Indiana remember and cherish him most as their unexampled war governor. He was then on their soil, where they could see and touch him, and his gigantic efforts during that period of fire were truly wrought with masterful hand. When the mightiest issue of the age was cast for settlement amid the stern forces of war, his place was with the foremost on the side of the right. His was a conspicuous power to discriminate against the nonessential and grasp and make effective the vital. He did not heed the tongue of calumny and detraction, but made herculean efforts to save his imperiled country. In the matchless scenes of that awful tragedy but one name could have precedence over his with the people of Indiana, and that the immortal name of Lincoln.

It is not possible, Mr. Speaker, with any knowledge of his career, to think of Morton except as great. His ceaseless energy suggests the ceaseless motion of the sea. Had he continued his life as lawyer and jurist he would have taken place with John Marshall and Daniel Webster; had he chosen the military profession he would have rivaled a Napoleon and a Grant. In the list of eminent war governors he easily stood at the top, and upon his advent to the Senate of the United States he ranked at once the equal of Sumner and his great compeers. Adventitious conditions did not contribute to his rise. From boyhood his chief capital for his future was reliance upon himself, upon his own integrity, upon his own conscious power to achieve. His was the genius of action, and when opportunity came he was equipped, ready, and equal to it.

In November, 1860, when the execution of the threat of secession was imminent, his was the first potential voice to sound throughout the nation that coercion should be the policy of the Government. Having thus declared himself and committed the State he governed, throughout the unspeakable conflict which followed all his gigantic powers were exercised in the cause of the Union.

The consideration of the obstacles he encountered and overcame in this task adds luster to his irrepressible qualities of mind and heart. In the capitol that sheltered him were State officials hostile to his determination that Indiana should contribute her full share toward the preservation of the Union. Likewise a hostile legislature adjourned without making appropriations to carry on the State government and institutions.

In various localities the State was honeycombed with Southern sympathizers, and from these even Morton's life was threatened and at least once attempted. But he resolutely ignored the hostility of officials; with a courage that was regal he disregarded threats of personal violence; he borrowed money on his own account to support the State institutions and pay the interest on her debt, and at the same time enlisted, clothed, armed, and furnished to the National Government from the State he loved more than 200,000 soldiers with a promptness and apparent facility that startled the whole country.

While other States were considering plans and enlistments the Hoosier regiments were taking the field and making their sacrifices for country and for home. Where weaker spirits would have faltered, his great soul was inspired in the presence of danger and necessity. And thus, by the indomitable will and steadfast vigil and tireless labors of her great war governor, sustained by a brave and generous people, did the proud State of Indiana assume at once and forever her merited position with the great Commonwealths of the nation.

Mr. Speaker, it is pleasing to contemplate another side of the life of the great Morton. The public saw and judged of his conspicuous, his public, achievements. Every eye can see the sun; but the public knew little of the perfect domestic life he enjoyed. While his grasp upon momentous questions was of steel, his indictment and invective against wrong and injustice were heroic, in the sacred precincts of home he was gentle and loving as a woman. There he found his relaxation; there the perfect rest of the human life.

Linked with the question of the state of his soul he consciously carried to the very portals of the beyond his supreme love as husband and father. It is related that in the last hour Mrs. Morton asked if he was not afraid to die, and he answered in the negative. She then asked if he loved the Saviour, and he answered, with emphasis, "I do," and added, "and my wife and boys."

I hope it is not inappropriate to reveal, in this presence, at least, a little of the gentle side of this now illustrious man. As a youth it was my privilege to receive his words of encouragement and to feel the warmth of his genial hand clasp.

Mr. Speaker, if it is true that in great stress and emergency leaders of men are reared, and I believe it true, then is it easy to accept Morton as a gift to carry out the purposes of God among the sons of men. His was a character that towered. It stood through untold temptations and vicissitudes as the tall cliff around whose peak the lightning plays only to leave it the cleaner. We accept to-day the shining marble in yonder historic hall.

It typifies the physical presence of his great personality and the pride of Indiana in her chivalrous son.

But his heroic deeds for State and nation, the example of his patriotism, his uprightness among men, his love of home, and his exalted character will forever outshine the marble, and will survive while virtue and honor live. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] some days ago asked me to say a word on this occasion. In the business of the House and of the committee I have not had the time or the opportunity to prepare anything to submit. But, sir, there has been no occasion during my service in the House where my heart would prompt me more to submit a few remarks touching the life, the character, and the services of this great man.

I very well recollect the first time I ever saw him. Away back in 1856, when I was but a boy, during the Fremont campaign, living in the county of Park, Ind., Governor Morton, a candidate for governor on the Republican ticket, and a great meeting at the county seat of that county—Rockville. I, with many others from the neighborhood where I lived, went to that meeting, and for the first time listened to Mr. Morton. A new party had just been born, and, as I recollect, it required courage for a man to belong to that party at that time, his opponent, Governor Willard, a Democrat, an able and great man, having the confidence of his party—two young giants making a contest against each other.

The new party had just been organized and was accused of many improper things, being the party of abolitionism, of black Republicanism, and so on, and so on. I said a moment ago that it required courage—that it cost something then to belong to the Republican party. A great crowd, as I have said, had gathered together; and then this young man, standing, as it seemed to me, like a second Saul, a head and shoulders above his fellows, not only physically but intellectually, addressed the multitude.

There was but little of applause given to him during that two hours' talk; and it was two hours' talk, I recollect—such talk as I had never heard before and such talk and speech as I have never heard since. It was characterized by great intellectual force and great power, coupled with great animal force; and as a result of that great meeting, he being the retaining point on that day, you could see the people draw to him, and the faith of those was strengthened who were inclined to believe in the principles of the party just born, and were followers of the Pathfinder as their leader in that contest; and the great multitudes of people—some who had been Democrats, but did not agree with the doctrines of Democracy in apologizing for or defending the institution of slavery, and great numbers of men who theretofore had been Whigs and were afraid of the obloquy of belonging to the new party—came together, as it seemed to me, almost as one man; and that county, largely from the effects of that speech, the county of Park, from that time to the present has been a stronghold of the policies of the Republican party.

I again listened to him in 1860, when he was a candidate for lieutenant-governor. A little previous to that time, finding my home in Illinois, I did not see much of him, but I knew of him. He was a great leader in the politics and the progress of the contests that were made from 1861, when he became governor.

On an occasion of this kind of course it would not be proper, nor have I any desire, to speak of the party contests as a partisan. They are behind us. Men honestly held views different from each other, not only South but North; views that came with education, environments, and surroundings; and I may say, and truly say, that in that contest in Indiana, settled as it was largely from Kentucky, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Tennessee, the same as in southern and central Illinois, men by education and environment had extreme feelings touching the great contest.

It was Morton's duty as governor of the State of Indiana to lead in the contest. With nerve and courage through that contest of four years, from 1861 to 1865, as governor of that State, leading the people of that State under most trying circumstances, he gave strong, earnest, and effective support to the President of the United States; and of all the great war governors he was the greatest, and I am not saying less for the others, but more for him.

No man can write the history of that great contest, has written it, or can in the future write it, without making Oliver P. Morton one of the great characters in it. I think I know that he saved his State from civil war, and his influence was especially felt over in Illinois and supplemented the efforts of the great war governor Richard Yates.

Great men sometimes live and die without being known. I believe there are as many strong men now in the United States, perhaps more, than there ever were before, but many of them will not be known, and will live and die without attracting much of notice. The Republic, in perilous times, when surrounded by circumstances that require great wisdom, great strength and courage, has always found great men to meet them. Oliver P. Morton was in Indiana, not only for Indiana but for the whole country, a saving force in that great emergency.

Later on he became Senator from the State of Indiana. I never met him again until in the Forty-third Congress, when I served my first term here. I took an early opportunity to call upon Oliver P. Morton and pay my respects, telling him where I had first seen him and the circumstances. It seemed to interest him, and from that time on my acquaintance was fairly intimate with him. Reconstruction was not at that time complete. There were great debates in the Senate. The results of the great contest were being secured.

I frequently went to the other end of the Capitol that I might listen to the debates. There were great men there. Morton, Senator Carpenter, Senator Logan were there; and other great men upon the other side, among them Thurman, of Ohio. There were veritable giants there upon each side. Conkling was there, amongst others.

I do not think Mr. Morton in eloquence, culture, or polish was the equal of Senator Conkling; I do not think, in some respects, that he was the equal of Senator Thurman or Senator Carpenter; but as I listened from day to day, Morton sitting in a chair, unable to stand, but sitting and talking in these great debates, with his great strength and earnestness, his great voice, and his great intellectual force, he impressed me then, and my recollection of him is now—and the reading of some of those debates confirms my recollection—he was easily the strongest and best debater that I have ever had the pleasure of listening to in that great body or this great body, and in making that remark I do not disparage the great men with whom he had contests.

Weakened by disease, he fought the grim monster month by month and year by year to the end by his strong will power, keeping him at bay. But finally the sad hour came when he was to pass from earth, and he passed from earth as he lived, with dignity and with courage. His character, his teachings, his courage, his intelligence and strength, long years after all of us shall have passed away, will live in history, an example and an inspiration to those who shall do the Republic service in perilous times. Peace to his ashes. [Applause.]

Mr. WATSON. Mr. Speaker—

> Can storied urn, or animated bust,
> Back to its mansion call the fleeting breath?
> Can honor's voice provoke the silent dust,
> Or flatt'ry soothe the dull cold ear of death?

These solemn questions, asked with such marvelous richness of poetic beauty, carry with them their own reply. They implicitly tell us that the dead are as far beyond the reach of our short arms as are the stars that shine above us in the heavens at night. Shakespeare, that marvelous delineator of human character and impulses, recognizing the tendency in man to excessively eulogize the dead, puts it upon the tongue of his supreme orator to exclaim:

> I come to bury Cæsar, not to praise him.

And so, I shall indulge in no fulsome flattery; I shall enter upon no lofty panegyric. For well nigh a quarter of a century he has slept in the cold and narrow house, indifferent alike to the careless shallows and the tragic deeps of human life, above the utmost power of human help or harm, beyond the speech of the gem-laden tongue of praise or the putrid lips of calumny and hate. In his sculptured presence all tongues are silent save those of praise; all lips are mute save those of love. There were sufficient eulogy for his great soul.

It is for the living, rather, that these exercises are of surpassing moment. And so, we are assembled in this great forum, with every mournful ceremony of respect, to recall the instructive story of his life; to commemorate the commanding virtues of his soul; to learn again the heroic lessons that he taught; to draw from his lofty example and luminous patriotism renewed inspiration for the solution of the mighty problems that confront and vex us as a people.

To-day the rivalries and resentments engendered by the greatest conflict of our history are all extinguished, and we can search out the place in the temple of fame which impartial history has irreversibly decreed to him. We can, in a spirit of fairness and candor, determine why Indiana should have provided a marble representation of her greatest son, and why this nation should accept this speechless yet eloquent figure to adorn the Rotunda of her Capitol.

Three forces enter into and determine the character of every man—the force of heredity, the force of environment, the force of will.

Morton sprang from a sturdy stock—his paternal ancestry from Rhode Island, whither they came with Roger Williams; his maternal from New Jersey. These States derived it from England, and England bred it at a time when Puritans were made—men of iron mold, hammered out upon the anvil of adversity. If, sir, it be true that "the source of genius is oftimes in ancestry," Morton was doubtless indebted to that ancestry for the solid granite of his character, for from them he obtained that indomitable will that met no obstacle it could not overcome, that masterful energy that set no limit to its possibilities, that inflexible purpose that never faltered in the accomplishment of its object, that heroic optimism that in every conflict steadfastly believed in the ultimate triumph of the right.

Like nearly all the conspicuous figures of our history, he was a self-made man. "Orphanage was his only patrimony." He was not born in the lap of lavish luxury, but was reared in poverty; not, indeed, that degraded and dependent indigence so prevalent in our large cities, but that healthful poverty that stimulates to action, that sets a ladder for ambition, that gives wing to inborn hope. What he won was his because of genius and of talent, by dint of struggle and of toil.

Young Morton possessed to a remarkable degree the art of creating opportunities, of fashioning circumstances, of foreseeing the future and molding it to the accomplishment of his purposes.

He was also gifted with that intuitive sagacity that enabled him to seize the opportunity when it did come and profit by it immeasurably, to take the flood tide of the wave and on its crest to ride to victory and to final triumph.

As the gold in the mountain may be hurled to the surface by a mighty volcanic outburst, so some men are brought to the supreme summit of affairs by ghastly revolution. But if no revolution comes, that gold, to be enjoyed, must be patiently sought and as patiently dug. Oliver P. Morton could not have remained unknown in any country or in any age, for both in boyhood and in manhood he possessed that overpowering and overmastering will that with a regal stride scaled every height and forced him to the very front as by right.

Oliver P. Morton was thrust into life in an era of the profoundest moral apathy in our history. When he was born, in Wayne County, Ind., in the district which I have the honor to represent, seventy-six years ago last August, the fervor of the Revolution had long since spent its force, while the fires of slavery agitation, which were subsequently to envelop and well-nigh consume the Republic, were not yet kindled.

While he was yet in his childish years Garrison issued the first Liberator and "Nat" Turner's insurrection occurred in Virginia. While he was yet a youthful lad that same Garrison, within sight of Faneuil Hall, in a city which had taught a nation its independence, was thrust into prison for declaring that all men are created free, and in the great State of Illinois Lovejoy, for reiterating the principles of the Declaration of Independence, was cruelly murdered.

And so the youthful Morton grew and strengthened with the years, "all unconscious of the ominous and threatening clouds in the political sky above, the quaking and convulsion of the political earth beneath," in the future outbreak and final and triumphant culmination of which he was to play so important and conspicuous a part.

At the tender age of 4 death deprived him of his mother, and his home was subsequently made among his relatives.

His education consisted in attendance upon the school of his native village, supplemented by two years at Miami University, at Oxford, Ohio, after which he served four years as an apprentice in learning the trade of a hatter.

There was nothing fascinating for him in this occupation, however, and he succeeded but indifferently. He longed for other and broader fields of usefulness. His ambition was on the wing and beckoned him onward and upward. But the four years of his service here assisted in laying the broad foundation of his character. He acquired an accurate knowledge of men and affairs. He became a student by force and habit. In the debating school he developed into a fluent talker and a ready speaker—the easy master of forceful speech. He became a leader by the bent and inclination of his mind. Thus equipped he entered upon the study of the law in 1843.

His venerable preceptor, Hon. John S. Newman, thus wrote of him:

> Senator Morton came into my office at Centerville in 1843 at the age of 20. As a student he was industrious and thoughtful; anxious at all times to accomplish everything he undertook. In discussing questions that arose in his reading he exhibited a quickness of comprehension and a clearness in statement that gave promise of that success in his chosen profession which he afterwards secured.

His professional career covered the seventeen years from 1843 to 1861, when he became governor of Indiana. When he retired from the profession he stood well toward the front.

He was a splendid lawyer. He knew the history of the law, its growth, its evolution. "From the fields of contest in the past he saw great principles arise and take the form of law." He knew that truth is a structure reared only on the battlefields of contending forces; that these truths ripen into principles, and these principles into law. These principles he knew—these larger outlines of the law. He was not a case lawyer; he was not a precedent hunter; he was not an index to many musty books, not "an echo of a voice long stilled;" but in the field of research and investigation he was original, thoughtful, and profound.

At the age of 29 he was appointed judge, and served on the bench one year, when he resigned. He was ill adapted to the position. His aggressive and combative spirit longed for the field of conflict. He was essentially a child of the storm, and in this great forum had no superior and few equals. He forged steadily forward and upward because of his courage, his perseverance, and his indomitable will, until he became the acknowledged leader of the bar of eastern Indiana—a bar numbering among its members such men as Caleb B. Smith, afterwards a Cabinet member; Samuel W. Parker, James Rariden, Jehu T. Elliott, afterwards judge of the supreme court of Indiana; Charles H. Test, John S. Newman, George W. Julian, member of Congress and candidate for Vice-President on Free Soil ticket, and Thomas M. Browne, who afterwards represented that Congressional district in this body with conspicuous ability for fourteen years.

General Browne, in speaking of him as a lawyer, says:

> He presented a legal question with great force and clearness. With a mind at once robust and critical, he was able to grasp the whole scope of his subject, to fathom its profoundest depths and master its minutest details. With a quickness that was notable he seized upon the strong point in his case and centered upon it every power of his mind. He fortified it with facts, intrenched it behind with precedents, environed it about with illustrations, until his position seemed impregnable. While he chose with unerring certainty the strong point in his own cause, with equal readiness and accuracy he discovered the weak one in that of his adversary.
> No man was better versed in putting facts to the court or jury. He readily detected a sophistry and would crush it into fragments as the "spray is broken upon the rocks." With no eloquence other than the talent of giving force to reason, he was a most successful and formidable jury lawyer. He had a keen insight into human nature and possessed an extraordinary influence over men. With a dominion that was absolute, he seized upon the sympathy of the jury and poured the resistless tide of his own earnest emotions and convictions into their hearts.

Had he chosen to remain in this profession, who can doubt his final success and complete triumph?

But this was not to be. His was destined for a broader field of action. His soul was molded for a more heroic strife. In the beginning of one of the mightiest conflicts of history he was taken from his office to uphold a State. A crisis was approaching in the history of our country. One that would require for its solution the sternest morality and the loftiest patriotism; the grandest combination of heart, conscience, and brain beneath the flag. It was for such prodigious tasks that his titanic abilities were destined. He flung himself into the conflict with all the fiery ardor of his impassioned soul.

No power in all the history of the world was ever more firmly established than was slavery in this country during the time Morton was achieving success at the bar. Intrenched behind popular favor, social power, boundless wealth, a cringing state, and an uncensuring church, it deemed itself impregnable. Before this crime wealth and power fell upon their knees. The rich, the great, the strong, the wise, the good bowed low before its cruel might. The men who spurned the Declaration of Independence were called the friends of the Republic, while those who refused to kneel were denounced as the enemies of their country.

For fifty years slavery ruled at the White House, made laws in the Capitol, wrote statutes in the legislative halls, and dictated the policy of the Executive Chamber. "Courts of justice were its ministers, and legislatures were its lackeys." It ruled this entire nation with absolute sway, and with an iron hand suppressed discussion of its institutions. It interpreted the Bible to support its savage code. It prohibited in the free States schools for the hated race, and with hungry hounds hunted women who taught little children to read.

"It tore the Golden Rule from the schoolbook and from the book of prayer the pictured benignity of Christ." Under the shadow of the Dome of our national Capitol droves of slaves with clanking chains upon their limbs were scourged and driven to the market. This system, which, fortified in selfish greed, enlisted to its support the lowest instincts of man, which "transfigured with hate the gentle face of mercy," and which violated every Christian precept, was such a damning blot upon the fair name of the Republic that it could be wiped out only with blood. Slavery herself hastened the crisis.

Lovejoy was murdered, Garrison imprisoned, Sumner stricken down. The fugitive slave law—passed by compromisers to appease the owners of human flesh—a law that put a chain on the neck of every man, was placed upon the statute books; the Missouri compromise was swept aside, and slavery marshaled her forces to invade the virgin soil of the free Territories.

But a few heroic men cried out, "No!" and slavery recoiled at the first word of independence spoken to her in all her years of power. But she recovered from the shock and gathered all her forces about her not only to preserve her own domain but also to conquer an empire for her dominion. She sought to tear the Stars and Stripes into shreds and from the tattered fragments to construct the Stars and Bars. She sought to crush the Union and from its ruins to erect a new nation whose foundation should be the stooping and lacerated backs of 4,000,000 human beings. But a merciful God interposed, the mighty North arose in the majesty of freedom, 2,000,000 soldiers sprang to arms to rescue the imperiled Republic, vindicate liberty, and perpetuate the Union, and after four years of unparalleled conflict the flag came forth with every star upon its folds.

Into this mighty conflict the young Morton threw himself with characteristic intensity. His early training and association had been with the Democratic party, but when its leaders sought with ruthless hand to sweep away the Missouri compromise he refused to follow.

He had heard the ringing words of Sumner when he cried out to the slave oligarchy in the Senate:

> Say in your lofty madness that you own the sun, the moon, the stars, but do not say that you own a man, endowed with a soul that shall live immortal when sun and moon and stars shall have passed away.

And they made a lasting impress on his soul. Above the lightning's flash and the thunder's peal he had heard the clarion voice of Wendell Phillips crying clearly and steadily above the din, "Slavery must be destroyed! Slavery must be destroyed!" He saw and understood. And in the shadow of secession, on the edge of disunion, near the abyss of war, with the air filled with the ominous and threatening sounds of preparation, to the demands of his party that the Missouri compromise should be repealed, he cried out, "No!"

> So near is grandeur to our dust,
> So near is God to man,
> When duty whispers low, "Thou must,"
> The youth replies, "I can."

He was unquestionably the choice of his party for the nomination for Congress in his district, and was even mentioned for the United States Senatorship, but his convictions on the subject were so strong that he put aside all blandishments in order that he might follow his sense of right.

He did not leave his party, however, without a struggle, but labored ceaselessly with its leaders in the State in order to prevent a resolution supporting the repeal of the Missouri compromise; but his labors were in vain, and when, amid the hisses and jeers of the Democratic State convention of that year, he withdrew from its midst they themselves had virtually expelled from their party the man who was to be the most steadfast and the most powerful champion of the Republican principles in Indiana, if not in the nation, for many years to come.

In 1856, at the age of 33, he was nominated by the young Republican party as its candidate for governor. He was defeated in that contest, but his active canvass demonstrated his transcendent ability to grapple with the great problems which then confronted the people, and his services were so conspicuous that he easily became the leader of his party in that pivotal State, and from that time forward all looked to him for counsel, for leadership, for advice. In 1860 he was nominated and elected lieutenant-governor, but served in that office but two days. Henry S. Lane, who was elected governor, was sent to the Senate, and Oliver P. Morton at once entered upon the duties of the chief executive office of Indiana.

Hon. William Dudley Foulke, the cultured and classical biographer of Oliver P. Morton, who for so many years lived in the same county with him, thus describes the condition of Indiana when he became governor:

> Such was the condition of Indiana; her treasury bankrupt, her credit poor, frauds everywhere, no money, no arms, no ammunition, no militia, except on paper—and even this organization in the hands of officers many of whom were in sympathy with rebellion—a legislature with a formidable minority, reluctant and revolutionary, having the power and the will to stop even the most needful measures of public defense—such was the condition of the State when the most gigantic war in American history broke out, and demanded resources and energy for which prosperous times and undivided patriotism would seem barely sufficient. But the will and intellect of the great war governor were equal to the emergency.

The mantle of prophecy no longer descends upon a successor; but in every age there are a few masterful men who are masterful because they comprehend the true condition of affairs, see clearly the inevitable end from the beginning, and at once discern the surest and the swiftest way to reach the goal. Such a man was Oliver P. Morton, and on the 22d of November, 1860, but a few days after the election of Abraham Lincoln, in a speech on the duty of the hour, he gave utterance to truths so great and announced principles so weighty that it rang throughout the land like a bugle call. At that time the shadow of secession was flung across the land. "In the darkness the bravest halted, the stoutest stood appalled."

Horace Greeley proposed that the erring sisters be allowed to depart in peace, and the sentiment was echoed and reechoed throughout the North. Conferences, conventions, compromises, peace proposals, panaceas, and remedies followed in wild disorder. Abraham Lincoln had not yet spoken. The nation was bewildered. Confusion reigned supreme. The one momentous question of the hour was, "What shall be done if South Carolina secedes?" and brave men answered it with bated breath. It was reserved for Morton to speak, to formulate a policy, to announce a plan, and he did this so boldly, so fearlessly, so ably, that Abraham Lincoln, when he read the speech, exclaimed, "That settles the whole matter. It states the necessary policy of the Government," and all the North applauded. Hear his ringing words:

> There is but one way in which the President can be absolved from his duty to exert all the power reposed in his hands by the Constitution to enforce the laws in South Carolina, and that is by our acknowledgment of her independence. The Constitution provides that Congress may admit new States into the Union, but there is no provision for turning one out or permitting one to go out. A State once admitted into the Union becomes a part of the body of the nation. A severance or secession is not contemplated by the Constitution as permissible or possible.
> If we allow a State peaceably to secede, we thereby concede the right of secession in the most substantial and solemn manner. It would be sheer nonsense to allow a State to secede and yet deny that other States may retire in the same manner whenever they see fit. We can not, therefore, allow South Carolina to secede without conceding the right, and thereby settling the principle as to the remaining States. The right of secession conceded, the nation is dissolved. Instead of having a nation—one mighty people—we have but a collection, a combination of thirty-three independent and petty States, held together by a treaty which has hitherto been called a Constitution, of the infraction of which Constitution each State is to be the judge, and from which combination any State may withdraw at pleasure.
>
> If South Carolina gets out of the Union, I trust it will be at the point of the bayonet, after our best efforts have failed to compel her submission to the laws. Better concede her independence to force, to revolution, than to right and principle.
>
> Shall we now surrender the nation without a struggle, and let the Union go with merely a few hard words? Shall we encourage faint-hearted traitors to pursue their treason, by advising them in advance that it will be safe and successful? If it was worth a bloody struggle to establish this nation, it is worth one to preserve it; and I trust that we shall not, by surrendering with indecent haste, publish to the world that the inheritance which our fathers purchased with their blood we have given up to save ours. Seven years is but a day in the life of a nation, and I would rather come out of the struggle at the end of that time defeated in arms and conceding independence to successful revolution than purchase present peace by the concession of a principle that must inevitably explode this nation into small and dishonored fragments.

As governor of Indiana he had the most prodigious tasks of her history to perform. Frauds, gigantic and unblushing, were rampant on every hand. With one powerful blow he crushed them all, brought order out of chaos and purity out of corruption.

His State seemed to be the center of the conflicting elements, of the struggle between union and disunion, slavery and freedom. For many months it trembled on the edge of secession, and naught but his stalwart presence preserved it to the Union. He, in and of himself, formed an impassable barrier between Indiana and the abyss of secession.

His record as the war governor of Indiana is without a parallel, even in that heroic day. But the darker the hour the more determined his purpose, the greater the obstacle the more unbending his will. As Conkling so well said of him, "No labor discouraged him, no contingency appalled him, no disadvantage dismayed him, no defeat disheartened him."

When the Government was tardy in supplying him with ammunition, he directed, without warrant of law, an establishment for his own State, which freely supplied all Indiana soldiers, frequently served the Government, and very often administered to the necessities of neighboring States. On his own responsibility he purchased vast quantities of clothing and stores for Indiana soldiers. He established a great sanitary commission which ministered to the wants of every Hoosier soldier on every battlefield and in every camp. His was a sleepless vigilance. He organized his own physicians and nurses into trained corps, and no sooner had the smoke of battle risen from the field than his ministers of mercy were bending over the wounded and caring for the dying.

"These agents had their instructions to follow in the track of our armies, to pick up the disabled who might have fallen by the wayside; to visit the hospitals, report the names of the sick, wounded, and dead, and afford relief wherever it could be afforded; to inform the State authorities what kind of supplies were needed and where to visit the troops in the field, ascertain their wants and condition, and aid in having their requests for supplies promptly filled. They aided in procuring furloughs for the sick and wounded and discharges for such as would not be able to serve again; in furnishing transportation at the expense of the State for such as had not the means of getting home; in receiving the soldiers' money and distributing it to their families; in hunting up the descriptive rolls for such as had been long confined in hospitals, but for want of their rolls could not be paid or discharged; in visiting battlefields, bringing home the wounded, and distributing sanitary stores."

He anticipated every soldier's want. He ministered to every soldier's necessity. He gratified every soldier's wish. He made frequent and stirring appeals to the loyal women of his State, and, with devotion worthy so grand a cause, they responded to his every call. The amount of stores and clothing and other necessities thus supplied was incalculable, and the good thus accomplished inconceivable. Morton himself, even amidst his herculean labors, found time to visit many battlefields and encourage his Hoosier boys. One wounded soldier said of him after the battle of Shiloh:

> I saw the old governor reach out and shake hands with us, and then saw the tears starting out of his eyes as he saw the wounded and heard their groans. Since then I have appreciated his love for us.

He was the last to bid farewell to every regiment as it marched proudly away to the conflict, and was the first to greet it as it returned home, marching proudly to the inspiring music of the Union.

He was the idol of his soldiers. He was as true to them as the magnetic needle to the pole. Among them his name was magic and his presence was inspiration. As Garfield said of him:

> The memory of Governor Morton will be forever cherished and honored by the soldiers of my State. They fought side by side with the soldiers of Indiana, and on a hundred glorious fields his name was the battle cry of the noble regiments which he had organized and inspired with his own lofty spirit.

He was indeed the "soldier's friend" in the hour of their necessity and the day of their distress. And, sir, no truer or more fitting words could be inscribed upon the statue which we this day present in honor of his memory than these:

> Morton—The soldier's friend.

The labors he performed in this field alone were prodigious, enough to overwhelm a man of less titanic mold, but these were the very least of his great deeds.

The celerity with which he enlisted men and organized regiments has never been excelled. No demand was made upon him which was not promptly met. With a population well-nigh one-half of which was opposed to the purposes of the war and one-third of which was openly hostile to the cause of the Union, with treason raging all about him and treasonable organizations innumerable in his State, he yet organized, equipped, and hurried to the front 208,000 of Indiana's loyal sons—on every crimson field their blood was poured; on every trembling slope their valor was displayed.

While these thousands of brave men were at the front struggling to maintain the supremacy of the Union, traitors in the rear, with tireless vigilance, were always organizing, always agitating, always seeking to overthrow Morton and the State government and carry Indiana into the Confederacy. More than 50,000 men were armed at one time for this black purpose. Indiana fairly swarmed with treasonable societies. There were the "Knights of the Golden Circle," the "Circle of the Mighty Host," the "Mutual Protective Society," the "Knights of the White Camelia," the "Circle of Honor," the "Order of American Knights," and, last and most powerful, the "Sons of Liberty." But Morton crushed them all.

When Kentucky was threatened with invasion, Governor Boyle implored Morton's powerful aid. He sent troops flying to that border State, where the conflict was so fierce and unrelenting, to uphold the Union cause. According to Mr. Foulke, he thus announced the departure of the troops:

August 17. I send 1,000 men to-night; 7,000 to-morrow and Tuesday.
August 21. I sent another regiment last night; a battery will go to-morrow. The Sixty-ninth has started. The Seventy-fifth leaves at 6 p. m. and the Seventy-fourth at 9 p. m. to-day for Louisville.
August 23. Will have at least 17 additional regiments ready for arms this time next week.
August 26. The Seventy-ninth leaves Tuesday; will hurry others; Indiana has put 14,480 men in Kentucky up to Friday last; this will make it 19,206 by Thursday, this week. This includes two batteries.
August 27. Another regiment can leave to-morrow; one leaves this evening.
August 30. The Eighty-ninth leaves this afternoon. The Eighty-first and Eighty-second will be armed to-day. Two regiments will start to-morrow, and five more will be ready next week.
August 31. The Eighty-eighth is at the depot. The Eighty-seventh will be in Louisville to-morrow morning. Two regiments leave to-day and two more to night.

In this way he organized, equipped, and sent 14,000 men into the field in four days.

There was no money to pay bounties; Morton borrowed it. There was no money for advance pay; Morton borrowed it. In this way he borrowed on his own responsibility, without security, with no pledge save his own word, many millions of money during that awful war, and at this time alone it amounted to over $500,000. But the work must be done. Nothing was permitted to stand in his way. His imperial will crushed every obstacle in his path.

When Cincinnati was threatened, the mayor telegraphed Morton for aid. Instantly the answer was flashed over the wires:

One battery ready with two carloads of ammunition. Will send another train in two hours.

In compliance with this promise he sent 20 pieces of artillery, 3,000 stands of arms, 31,136 rounds of artillery ammunition, and 3,365,000 musket cartridges, all of which arrived in Cincinnati within fifteen hours after the reception of the first news. The manner in which he furnished troops was so surprising that a prominent man in Louisville, speaking of it, said:

If you want soldiers from Indiana, all you have to do is to take some blue cloth and brass buttons, throw them into a hopper, put Morton at the crank, and they will come out regiments.

Morton anticipated every call for troops and constantly enlisted regiments in advance. He was always ready, and Indiana regiments were almost invariably first in the field. Besides all this, when Morgan entered the State, he prepared in a single week 20 regiments of militia to repel the invader from Hoosier soil.

He was utterly indifferent to obstacles. His overmastering will could not be thwarted. A hostile legislature, reeking with treason, sought to rob him of his military power and thus bring revolution and anarchy upon the State. Morton's friends withdrew and left it without a quorum and powerless to act. It adjourned without having appropriated a single dollar to carry on the government. But he was not dismayed. He appealed to the supporters of the Union throughout the State and to his friends in the East. He thus borrowed over $2,000,000, without a fragment of security, to maintain the government of his State, to aid in keeping the boys in blue at the front and the old flag in its place in the heavens. And every dollar of the sum was afterwards repaid.

He was the earnest friend of Abraham Lincoln, the loyal supporter of Edwin M. Stanton. He never wavered in his devotion to them, and they leaned strongly upon him in that trying crisis of our country's history.

Morton greatly feared the Northwest conspiracy, which was so earnestly advocated by so many of the distinguished leaders of the opposition in Indiana. In order to prevent the consummation of this disaster and to crush the hope of those who fostered it he insisted that the Mississippi should be opened for the commerce of the Northwestern States, and that thereby also the Southern Confederacy should be rent in twain. Impatient of delay because his cherished plan was not speedily carried into execution, he himself offered to lead an army for that purpose into the field, but President Lincoln deemed his services too valuable as the chief executive of that great pivotal State, and his offer was declined.

The following letter of Salmon P. Chase, expressive of the relations between Morton and Stanton, will not be inappropriate at this place:

WASHINGTON, November 10, 1865.

MY DEAR GOVERNOR: I think it is the right of men who have ably and faithfully served their country to know that their labors are appreciated. So I will not deny myself the pleasure of telling you that Secretary Stanton was with me last evening, and we, naturally turning our minds to the past, fell to talking of you. We agreed that no governor had rendered such services or displayed such courage or ability in administration, and we agreed that your recent services were the most meritorious of all, because rendered under circumstances of personal risk of health and life which would have been by almost any man regarded and by all accepted as good reason for total inaction.

I have seldom heard Stanton express himself so earnestly. I hope you will derive some satisfaction from this little relation. The talk gave much to me.

Cordially, your friend,

S. P. CHASE.

Sir, why should Indiana present this marble figure of her greatest son? Because he saved her for the Union, and in thus saving her aided immeasurably in saving the Union itself. As Senator Booth well said:

To leave out Morton and his influence would be to rewrite the history of this country for the last eighteen years and to modify it for all time to come. In the great struggle on which the existence of the Union was staked he held the central fort. No living man can tell what the result would have been had he not been where he was and what he was.

He was elected governor in 1864 and was advanced to the position of United States Senator on the 22d of January, 1867.

He entered that great body at the special session on the 4th of March, 1867, and at once advanced to the front with that commanding ease that ever marked his course. He was the one man who was never required to serve an apprenticeship in that body. On the very day he entered it he assumed the leadership; a position he did not relinquish and from which he could not be dislodged, but proudly held through all the varying vicissitudes of political life until the day of his death in 1879. And the classical Sumner was there. The imperious Conkling was there. The wise Sherman was there. The profound Edmunds was there. The sagacious Cameron was there, and so were the astute Thurman and the able Pendleton.

Great men were there from every State, but this man, of giant intellect, of granite will, of unyielding conviction, soon outstripped them all. And this leadership was no mere accident. It was not the result of craft or cunning. Such methods he disdained. But his massive ability as a debater, his unbending will, the profound depth of his convictions, the unaffected sincerity of his purpose, all combined to supply that irresistible momentum which pushed him to the forefront and that steadfast power is held him there.

He was the greatest debater of his time—intense, logical, and profound; bold, manly, and energetic. His was the ponderous and invincible logic of a Webster. He disdained utterly the tawdry ornaments of speech. He never resorted to the trickery of rhetoric. His diction was so simple, his logic so overwhelming, that his hearers gave no heed to his sentences. The thought was so prominent that it stood boldly to the front and the words seemed to be massed behind it, crowding irresistibly upon his auditors. It was truth in action.

He accomplished so much in this chosen field because he never vainly attempted anything in speech. There was no pomp of declamation; no feigned earnestness; no superficial emotion. He never spoke until he had thoroughly mastered his subject, until the mind was convinced and the heart engaged, and then there was no affected intensity. The divine energy of his soul utterly possessed him, and his—

Pure and eloquent blood
Spoke in his cheek, and so distinctly wrought,
That one might almost say his body thought.

As an orator he was not overtrained; and certain it is that unless great care is taken such may be the case in oratory and speech. The round diamond has no brilliancy. It is only the angle that plants the rainbow in its bosom and mirrors the sunshine in its heart. If too much of the polishing process be indulged in, it loses both its corners and its value.

Language is the vehicle by which thought is conveyed from one mind to another. It is not an end, but a means. If the vehicle is cumbrous, the mind tires in its comprehension and loses the idea hidden within. The gorgeous outfit attracts the eye, but the rider is unnoticed. And so clearness, force, and earnestness are three indispensable elements of successful speech. In each and all of these he was a master. He had an abundant vocabulary of Anglo-Saxon words, those best adapted to the terse and forcible expression of thought; but never employed to so great a degree the Latin derivatives, those best adapted to copious imagery and charming ornamentation. He never spoke to please, but to convince. He never spoke to charm, but to arouse.

He never quoted a line of poetry; he never used an illustration; he never employed a metaphor. Some one said of him that he "turned a brood of thoughts upon the world without a rag to cover them." And while he was not elegant, not graceful, "yet," as Jefferson said of Adams, "he came out with a power, both of thought and expression, which moved us from our seats."

His great speech on reconstruction has certainly not been excelled in that body since Webster spoke. Walter Q. Gresham said of it that it was the greatest effort made in the Senate since the triumphant effort of the Massachusetts man. And yet it was not polished or ornamented with the graces of language. It was a learned, penetrating, constitutional argument expressed in a strain of elevated patriotism, and it announced the necessary policy of the Government.

Others have more vividly portrayed his characteristics as a debater than I can hope to do. Senator Booth well said:

As a debater he was an athlete, trained down to pure muscle. In speech, careless of the graces of oratory and polish of style, his earnestness enchained attention, his directness carried conviction, and there was a natural symmetry in the strength of his statements above the reach of art.

Senator Wadleigh thus forcibly expresses the same thought:

In robust manliness the intellect of Senator Morton was unexcelled. His speeches were marked by logical force, clear perception, and a strength of statement which amounted to demonstration. Though destitute of rhetoric and bare of ornament, their massive force almost silenced doubt and compelled conviction.

Senator Conkling thus describes him:

He will go down to a far hereafter, not as one who embellished and perpetuated his name by the studied and scholastic use of words, nor as a herald of resounding theories, but rather as one who day by day on the journey of life met actual affairs and realities and grappled them with a grasp too resolute and quick to loiter for the ornament or the advantage of protracted and tranquil meditation.

Senator Edmunds well said of him:

The graphic clearness of his statements, the simple directness of his logic, and a sense of his sincere earnestness that he impressed upon his hearers placed him among the most powerful and successful speakers.

Senator Paddock thus voices this sentiment:

We, sir, do well remember that with all this blight upon his physical powers the great Senator bore an intellectual lance to the very last day of his career in this Chamber which no adversary ever despised or was overeager to measure. Often during the period of my service here have I seen the whole Senate filled with admiration of him, when, after many days, perhaps weeks, of continuous debate upon some important question in which he had constantly participated, and when the endurance of even the very strongest had been greatly overtaxed, he arose, and with no external evidence of weariness, restated, reviewed all the arguments of perhaps a dozen adversaries in the discussion, and with one great, masterful, overpowering presentation of the law and the facts in the case answered them all at once. When the full river of his speech came down upon an opposing disputant with its richly laden argosies of fact and precedent—of thought, philosophy, and logic—if his opponent himself were not a master in debate he was sure to be overwhelmed, for only such a one could stand at all against the almost resistless current of his argument.

General Garfield said of him:

He possessed an intellect of remarkable clearness and force. With keen analysis he found the core of the question and worked from the center outward. He cared little for the mere graces of speech, but few men have been so greatly endowed with the power of clear statement and unassailable argument. The path of his thought was straight, like that of the swift cannon ball, shattering that it may reach and shattering what it reaches. When he had hit the mark he used no additional words and sought for no decoration. These qualities, joined to his power of thinking quickly, placed him in the front rank of debaters and every year increased his power.

But the tremendous force of his incorrigible will will be best understood when it is remembered that during all his service in the Senate he was suffering from that dread disease from whose clutches there is no escape—paralysis. No words of mine can add to the encomium paid him by Senator Joseph E. McDonald, who served in that body with him from my State as a Democrat:

His labors upon the Electoral Commission during the eventful period when it seemed as if the very foundations of our Government were in danger of being uprooted are vividly remembered by all. Physically disabled, yet he was everywhere present; borne to his committee room, carried to this Chamber, lifted to his seat in the Electoral Commission by the strong arms of others, there remaining into the long, dreary hours of the night, tireless among the tired, pressing on where strong men gave way, he presents a picture that may well excite our wonder and challenge our admiration and for which history furnishes no example.

Also the words of Senator Thurman:

Suffering for years from a painful and hopeless disease that ultimately terminated his life, we yet saw him, year after year, perform an amount of labor from which the most robust man might have recoiled as from a task too heavy to be borne. He evaded no duty, however onerous; he asserted his claim to leadership at all times and under all circumstances, however great might be the sacrifice of comfort, repose, or health.

Another Senator said of him:

Mr. President, who of us has not now in his memory, photographed there ineffaceably, that sad, thoughtful, but resolute face, as through the corridors and into this Chamber, borne in his chair by two stalwart men, he came to his daily service? The noisy throng in the passages became silent and gave way at his approach with the same instinctive reverence that reached the gallant soldier who has borne a distinguished part in the memorable battle when afterwards he is brought from the field weary, worn, wounded, and dying. The doors flew open before him always as if by magic. The party spirit could at no time run so high as to cause to be withheld from him when he entered here the most cordial, the most sincere, the most respectful greeting from every Senator present.

He was the champion of sound money, the earnest advocate of resumption. In 1869 he introduced a bill providing for a return to specie payment in 1871, and made one of the master speeches of his life in support of it. But the time was not yet ripe for that movement, and his measure failed of passage. But when resumption did come, it was largely along lines which he had recommended and which he championed in his speech.

He was an ardent believer in expansion. The idea that his country should play a secondary part in the affairs of the world was to him little less than profanation. He believed in the masterful virility of the Anglo-Saxon race and in the manifest destiny of our nation.

Mr. Foulke relates of him that—

After it had become reasonably certain that Kansas would be admitted as a free State, he was standing one day in his law office in Centerville looking at a large map of the United States which hung upon the wall. He was examining carefully the Mexican States to the south. "Kibbey," said he to his partner, "if Kansas and Nebraska come in as free States, the other States will be free, too, and the present issues between the Republican and Democratic parties will be over.

"Now, we have a new party and we must have a living issue. The Democratic party has always been the champion of the extension of territory, and I think the Republicans ought to be ahead of them in advocating the acquisition of Mexico."

In 1870, in a speech in the Senate relative to the annexation of San Domingo, the cherished plan of President Grant, Senator Morton used this language, which in the light of present events seems to have had the force and authority of prophecy:

Mr. President, the annexation of San Domingo will come. I prophesy here to-night that it will come. It may not come in the time of General Grant, or in my time, but I believe it is destined to come, and with it, too, the annexation of Cuba and Porto Rico. Why, sir, this thing was foreseen long ago.

I will refer to a Massachusetts authority of high character nearly fifty years ago with regard to the propriety of annexing Cuba. Cuba is not now before the Senate nor involved in this controversy. But, sir, San Domingo lies between Cuba and Porto Rico. San Domingo is the key to the West Indies. It contains the finest harbor in the world. It commands the great Mona passage from the Atlantic Ocean to the Caribbean Sea. I wish to refer to what Mr. John Quincy Adams said with reference to the acquisition of Cuba, to show his foresight and his philosophy. In a letter written by him as Secretary of State to our minister in Spain, as long ago as 1823, he used the following language, which I commend to the Senator from Massachusetts:

"Numerous and formidable objections to the extension of our territorial dominions beyond the sea present themselves to the first contemplation of the subject; obstacles to the system of policy by which alone that result can be compassed and maintained are to be foreseen and surmounted both from at home and abroad; but there are laws of political as well as of physical gravitation, and if an apple served by the tempest from its native tree can not choose but fall to the ground, Cuba, forcibly disjoined from its own unnatural connection with Spain and incapable of self-support, can gravitate only toward the North American Union, which, by the same law of nature, can not cast her off from its bosom."

Sir, I regard it as destiny, not to be averted by the Senator from Massachusetts nor by any power, that we shall acquire San Domingo and Cuba and Porto Rico. * * *

I know there is talk about the populations of these countries. Sir, they are friendly to us now, and will rapidly become incorporated and consolidated with the people of this nation in case of acquisition. They will become absorbed in this great people long before the people of Canada will be converted to annexation. The Senator from Massachusetts is greatly in favor of the acquisition of all the Canadas, and I shall be, too, when the time comes, but I tell him that the most unconquerable and obstinate thing in this world is a British prejudice, and that the people of Canada are further from us to-day and are less inclined to annexation at this time than they were thirty years ago.

When they are ready to come peaceably and are anxious to do so, I am ready to receive them. But the line of demarcation between them and us, in point of feeling and sentiment, will still remain distinct long after that between us and the people of Santo Domingo and Cuba shall have been obliterated.

I remember, when the proposition was made to annex California and New Mexico, what fearful pictures were drawn of the character of the New Mexican population, and yet there is not to-day a more loyal people to this Government than the people of New Mexico.

How striking these words! How appropriate for present consideration.

He was universally admitted to be the greatest party leader of his time. His ability to organize regiments and send them flying to the field was equally marked in the arena of politics. He grappled his friends to him with hooks of steel, and alway had the most powerful and compact organization at his back of any man in public life. He possessed to an overmastering degree the art of selecting the field of contest, of arranging the details of the battle, of telling when to strike and where to strike and how to strike. For one dozen years he sounded the keynote of every campaign, either in the Senate or in Indiana, and his voice was the bugle call which brought the clans into action. He had the remarkable faculty of forcibly putting into language what everybody felt but could not express. And thus his speeches became platforms written in advance of conventions.

Morton could never be induced to leave the Senate. He was offered the exalted position of Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States; he was tendered the mission to the Court of St. James; he was asked to enter the Cabinet by two Presidents, but he declined them all.

He was possessed of an idea which dominated his whole life and impelled him irresistibly forward, and the Senate was the forum in which he could compel attention and achieve results.

He impressed his remarkable personality upon every one in his presence. They felt the unseen power of the man. "It was a strange sight," said Senator Ingalls, "to see that old giant lying helpless in bed, pounding and gesticulating and impressing his views upon the committee."

But the two successive objects of his life were, first, to save the Union, and, second, to incorporate the results of the war into the Constitution and the laws. To this end he lived and wrought.

To see the fruits of victory frittered away in a moment of apathy or false generosity was to him but sacrilege. To his mind the war decided that this was an indivisible Union, and that all men are absolutely equal before the law, and he never faltered or hesitated until the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments were embedded in the granite of the Constitution.

With him this was more than an opinion; it was a conviction. It was more than a sentiment; it was a passion. It was more than a theory; it was an inspiration. And to him, more than to any other, we owe those last elemental additions to the great charter of our liberty. To this end he brought to bear his power as an organizer, his ability as a leader, his force as an orator, his logic as a debater, his inflexible will, his titanic intellect, his regnant soul—and for this reason, above all else, his sculptured presence is a fit object to adorn and forever sanctify yon Pantheon of the Republic.

I sometimes think, sir, that we of the rising generation came too late upon the world's stage of action. I sometimes feel that it would have been better to live when Washington graced the earth; when Hamilton and Jefferson and Franklin and Madison and all that great galaxy of the world's liberators blazed forth in their full-orbed glory, and when they and their companions laid broad and deep and lasting the enduring foundations of our nation.

I sometimes feel, too, that it would have been greater to live when Webster lived; when Clay and Calhoun and Benton and Hayne fought the battles of the giants; when the real limits of the Constitution were eternally established and the lines of our future progress were permanently laid.

I sometimes feel, too, that it would have been grander to live when the land was wrapped in the sheeted flames of civil strife; when Lincoln, the emancipator, lived; when Grant and Sherman and Sheridan and Thomas and Logan and a million boys in blue fought; when Lee and Jackson and Johnston and Longstreet and a million boys in gray wrought; when our hillsides were drenched with the blood of our bravest and our best, and all our rivers ran red to the sea; when the indissoluble unity of the Union was forever established and the equality of all beneath our flag eternally settled.

But, sir, I am glad to-day that I am a child of these latest and best days of the Republic. I am glad that I am the heir of all the accumulated glory of the past. I am glad that mine is the priceless heritage of all the infinite toil and struggle of the centuries gone—the heroism of Washington, the patriotism of Webster, the martyrdom of Lincoln, the countless sacrifices of all who went down to the eternal glory of death for the liberty of men.

And to-day, as we stand upon the shining summit of the present and lift the thin veil which separates from the future, we can see that a grander day will soon be ushered in upon the children of the Republic yet to be—a broader, wiser, nobler day of universal peace.

And, sir, it will be the high privilege of our country, realizing that all the past was a necessity and that the present is an inspiration; our country having one flag without a stain, save the blood of soldiers who died to defend it; one Constitution without a seam, save where patriots have inlaid the eternal principles which strengthen it; one hope without a spot, save the sacrifices which must be endured to realize it; aye, it will be the sacred duty of our reunited country, which Morton loved and for which he wrought and died, to move forward to the accomplishment of that high mission for which God created us. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolutions.

The resolutions were unanimously agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. METCALF, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

To Mr. JOY, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota, until May 1, on account of important business.

To Mr. GIBSON, for one week, on account of important business.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 3 o'clock and 37 minutes) the House adjourned until Monday next at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Light-House Board submitting an estimate of appropriations for a new light-vessel in the Fifth light-house district; to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Secretary of War submitting an estimate of appropriation for armament of fortifications—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

SENATE.

MONDAY, April 16, 1900.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last, and was interrupted by—

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the Journal be dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Mr. President, I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will resume the reading of the Journal.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the Journal, and was interrputed by—

Mr. SCOTT. I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the Journal be dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That request has been made, and there was objection to dispensing with the reading. The Journal will be read.

The reading of the Journal having been concluded, it was approved.

FIELD OPERATIONS OF THE DIVISION OF SOILS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed from the stereotype plates now in the Government Printing Office an extra edition of 13,000 copies of Report No. 64 of the Department of Agriculture, entitled "Field Operations of the Division of Soils in 1899;" 2,000 copies for distribution by Members and Delegates of the House of Representatives; 1,000 copies for distribution by Senators, and 10,000 copies for distribution by the Secretary of Agriculture.

REPORT ON INDIAN SCHOOLS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed for the use of the Department of the Interior, 1,000 extra copies of the Report of the Superintendent of Indian Schools for the year 1899.

ELECTION OF SENATORS BY DIRECT VOTE.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 28) proposing an amendment to the Constitution providing for the election of Senators of the United States was read the first time by its title.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask that the joint resolution be read at length.

The joint resolution was read the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That in lieu of the first paragraph of section 3 of Article I of the Constitution of the United States, and in lieu of so much of paragraph 2 of the same section as relates to the filling of vacancies, the following be proposed as an amendment to the Constitution, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as a part of the Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States:

"The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, who shall be elected by a direct vote of the people thereof for a term of six years, and each Senator shall have one vote. A plurality of the votes cast for candidates for Senator shall be sufficient to elect. The electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislatures, respectively.

"When a vacancy happens, by death, resignation, or otherwise, in the representation of any State in the Senate, the same shall be filled for the unexpired term thereof in the same manner as is provided for the election of Senators in paragraph 1: Provided, That the executive thereof may make temporary appointment until the next general or special election, in accordance with the statutes or constitution of such State."

This amendment shall not be so construed as to affect the election or term of any Senator chosen before it becomes valid as a part of the Constitution.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, this proposed amendment to the Constitution, passed by the House on Friday last, is, I think, in the exact language of a similar proposition that has passed the House three or four times and at least once unanimously. It is practically or in the exact words of similar propositions that have been introduced in this body and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections for many years in succession. I myself every year since I have been a member of this body have introduced a similar joint resolution, and it has gone to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, but no report has been made. There is such a proposition now before that committee, and I think half a dozen or a dozen other Senators have introduced similar measures.

Now, Mr. President, it is the purpose of a committee and its function to examine legislation and to report to the Senate its judgment as to its form, to amend it if it sees fit, or to make a favorable or unfavorable report, but not to smother legislation.

When a measure has been considered as long and as carefully as this has been, and public sentiment, as we understand it and have reason to believe is true, is so crystallized in its favor, and especially in view of the recent history of this country, giving most striking and eloquent object lessons and examples why such legislation should be adopted, I see but little need for committee consideration, because the form of this proposed amendment has been carefully considered for many years by the ablest men in this and the other House. A very able report has been prepared on the other side of the Chamber, and similar reports have been made for many sessions of Congress preceding.

Therefore, Mr. President, it is only a matter of form or habit to send such a measure to the committee. It could only go as a matter of courtesy, if the committee require it or desire it. Unless the committee desire to have this measure go before it for consideration, I wish to make a motion that it shall go on the Calendar. If the committee desire to have the joint resolution go before it for consideration, then the committee could desire it but for one purpose fairly, and that would be to consider it and report it. If it will be the purpose of the committee to let it lie and die, and not consider it and report it, then the committee should not ask or desire that it shall go before it at all.

Mr. SEWELL. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me? I wish to make an inquiry as to the parliamentary status of the joint resolution at the present time. Is it subject to objection?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution has been laid before the Senate by the Presiding Officer, and it can be read but once if an objection is made. Objection being made, debate would not be in order.

Mr. SEWELL. But it goes to the committee to which it properly belongs unless by a vote the Senate should order otherwise.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Not if an objection is made. If an objection is made, it lies over one day upon its first reading.

Mr. SEWELL. I do not object, then.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like, if the Senator from North Carolina will allow me, to interrupt him. He seems to be disposed to make imputations upon the committee somewhat prematurely, I think. He says that the committee could not want to consider this proposed amendment to the Constitution except for the purpose of determining whether or not it should be reported to the Senate; that it ought not to want to consider it for the purpose of smothering it. If the Senator means to suggest that there is or has been any such intention on the part of the committee, I should like to tell him right now that he is mistaken.

Mr. BUTLER. I state a fact and I will show.

Mr. CHANDLER. It is a fact that I want to speak of.

Mr. BUTLER. If it is not the fact, I would like to be informed.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator restate his fact?

Mr. BUTLER. The fact is that during this session of Congress similar propositions have gone to that committee; not only propositions introduced in this body, but House propositions, having passed the House unanimously, with no objection at least, have gone to the committee and slept and died and the committee made no report to this body.

Mr. CHANDLER. There has been a report made to the Senate in one Congress upon a joint resolution of this kind. There may have been a Congress in which no report was made upon the proposition, as the Senator says; but be that as it may, in the present Congress, I think, there has been nothing before the committee except the joint resolution introduced by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY], on which he made a speech, and the joint resolution went to the committee. There has been no motion, no suggestion, made in the committee by any member of the committee that that joint resolution should be taken up and acted upon. This joint resolution having passed the House, as I said a few days ago, reenforced the joint resolution introduced by the Senator from Arkansas, and if it goes to the committee it will be considered by the committee in due time. There is no purpose, as far as I know, on the part of the present committee, whether any previous committee has been delinquent or not, not to consider and report upon this measure.

I think, therefore, the Senator had better withhold any imputation upon the committee and allow the joint resolution to go in the usual form to the committee, and if it is not reported within a reasonable time the Senator has a perfect remedy. I do not quite like to have him attack us in advance.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I do not know that my remarks can be called an imputation on the committee. I did not intend that. But there has grown up a custom here that I think is unwarranted of committees holding matters that they do not themselves approve, and smothering them, if the term is not offensive, at least letting them die and not reporting them. Whether that is ever justifiable or not it surely is not in the case of a proposition of this nature, when thirty-four States through their legislatures have passed resolutions petitioning Congress to submit to them such a proposition. When the House has repeatedly passed the measure and there is so much public sentiment for it, it deserves the consideration of a committee. It is immaterial with me whether that report is favorable or unfavorable. I hope it will be favorable; but to get it before the Senate where it can be discussed and where the members of this body can vote on it is what I desire.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senator from North Carolina, I should like to make a request of the committee. I want to have them take into consideration and report, if this amendment should be adopted, what provision they can make for preventing political conventions from taking the place of the legislatures. Will not turning it from the legislature into a political convention create a greater danger of extraneous influence than now exists? I want the committee to report how this amendment, or any that they may report, will avoid the control of the election of Senators by political conventions, and whether the control by political conventions will be much of an improvement on legislatures. I want to have that point investigated and to have a parallel drawn in the report, so that we can form some idea as to whether we are not jumping out of the frying pan into the fire. I want to be informed on that point before I vote on the measure.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the opinion of the Chair, this debate is not in order, and it is proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to be permitted to say a word, as other Senators have been permitted, if there be no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. HALE. After the Senator from Massachusetts has spoken I shall object to further debate.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I think it is proper, after what the Senator from North Carolina has said, to point out the great gravity of the question to which he has spoken. This is the first proposition in our history seriously——

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator allow me a moment? I think if the merits of this subject are to be debated, the Senator from Maine ought to withdraw his objection. I do not think it is quite fair to have it debated on one side without anybody else having an opportunity to be heard. I do not mean to object to the Senator speaking.

Mr. HOAR. It was debated on one side, and I thought I ought to say one or two words on the other.

Mr. TELLER. I have no objection to the Senator speaking.

Mr. HALE. I had that in my mind, and I shall object. I do not think this matter should be brought up now for serious consideration and debate, because the Senate is not ready for it. Whenever the Senator from Massachusetts concludes his remarks I shall object to its further consideration.

Mr. HOAR. I rose to address myself to the question whether the joint resolution shall be considered without reference to a committee.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, with the Senator's permission, I should like to say just one word. I think this is a very important question. I think perhaps it ought to go to the committee. I am personally very much in favor of the joint resolution. If the committee should attempt, as is suggested, to smother it, I think we might have the strength here to take it out of the committee. However, I do not think the committee will attempt to smother this House resolution. That is all I will say now about it.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, this is the first attempt in our history seriously pressed to destroy the principles of the old Constitution of the United States. The amendments so far have been either amendments further securing personal rights, or, in the case of the machinery for electing a President, an amendment to the provision requiring the voting for two persons in the electoral college, which would frequently, of course, bring about a tie vote.

But this is a proposition which if carried out with legitimate consequences will, in my opinion, very soon destroy the equality of the States in the Senate and give us two legislative bodies, both the result of popular elections, the only difference between them being that the Senator is voted for by a larger constituency than the Representative.

I am surprised that the eagerness for dealing with this matter promptly and without the ordinary consideration comes from a representative of the State of North Carolina, a State now one of the smaller States in the Union and certain, as far as anything in our history can be certain, to remain in the great growth of the future stationary as compared with the great States, both in the East and in the West.

Now, in the character of the Senate, a body removed from popular election, chosen by a legislative and not a popular body, those great States will not submit long to an equality between Delaware and New York or between North Carolina and New York in that body, and you will have your unmixed and unchecked democracy instead of our plainer confederacy of republics and the National Government that we have now.

My honorable friend, with all respect, is contending against the dearest interest that the State of North Carolina can have if she is to preserve her equality in this Union in the future. From whatever other source pressure should come I am astonished that it comes from that source.

Now, Mr. President, with haste, without consideration, without debate, without, in my judgment, serious reflection, this popular cry has been taken up in another place, which is to result in the substitution of a new Constitution for our old one.

Of course the matter will come from the committee as it goes to the committee. Of course it will be considered. If the United States Senate has anything in its history of which the American people shall be proud, if it is worth defending, it should defend itself, and the defense should come upon the Senate floor.

Of course I am bound to submit now, as always, my judgment to the judgment of a majority, if there be a majority; but I think this is one of those things which is entitled to deliberation, to full reflection, to a study of history, and a comparison of the advantage of the new scheme with the old scheme.

Mr. BUTLER. If the Senator from Massachusetts will pardon me a moment——

Mr. HOAR. For that reason I hope the joint resolution will go to the committee, and I hope that it will be considered in the committee and in the Senate when there is time, when the thoughts of the Senate are open so that it can be dealt with as we deal with other great subjects, and that it is not to be crowded in at the end of a session when other vast new subjects are engrossing all our time and thought.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I did not yield to the Senator from Massachusetts to argue the merits of this question, for I think I could have ample argument to answer what he has said. But the observation of the Senator from Nevada——

Mr. HOAR. I only argued so much of it as to show that it should go to the committee; that it is a question of sufficient gravity for that purpose; that is all. I did not make any other argument.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I do not think argument is necessary when you have such object lessons more eloquent than words as we have in Pennsylvania and in some sagebrush States, and others to-day that speak to the country in thunder tones that overweigh all the scruples of possible danger that might come in the future when we have them here alive and present.

Mr. HOAR. If my honorable friend will pardon me, that is just what I addressed myself to. He says he does not think in any question of this kind argument is necessary. Now, I think it is.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I am ready to argue it; I am anxious to do it, and my only complaint is that so far I have been deprived of an opportunity to discuss it when the question was before the Senate to be acted upon. That is the only complaint I rose to make, and that is why I attempted to make a motion to place the joint resolution on the Calendar and not let it go to the committee.

But I have been assured since I rose by members of the committee that this question would probably have had consideration before had it not been for other matters that we are all familiar with which have engrossed all the time of the committee, and that at an early day the committee will take up this House joint resolution and report it to the Senate. In fact, I am assured that possibly a majority of the committee are now for it. At any rate, whether the report is favorable or unfavorable, I am assured that we will soon have it before the Senate in a shape for discussion and for action. With that assurance I am content, for I would rather that it should go before the committee and have a report made upon it in due season, so that we may possibly get action upon it at the present session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President, I wanted to say one word before this subject passed from the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Senator from Alabama will proceed.

Mr. PETTUS. I am sorry that the Senator from North Carolina chose to make these reflections on the committee; but so far as I am concerned, I leave that subject to the chairman. Individually I say that no committee of the Senate ought to be driven by any hard words that any man chooses to utter against it from considering a subject maturely and carefully, especially when you come because of a certain clamor to pull down one of the corner stones of the Republic. It ought not to be done in haste.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. HOAR. Has the joint resolution gone to the committee?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

STATIONERY FOR TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the chief of division of stationery, printing, and blanks, Treasury Department, in regard to the necessity for an additional appropriation of $7,000 for stationery for the Department for the remainder of the current fiscal year; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

DOCUMENTARY HISTORY OF SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, transmitting a compilation of the acts, resolutions, and proceedings of Congress from its Forty-fifth session to its Fifty-fifth session, inclusive, relating to the Smithsonian Institution and the work intrusted to its care by the Government; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope the Committee on Printing will look at that document and have it printed if they deem it worthy.

VESSEL SNOW ISABELLA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting the conclusions of fact and of law filed under the act of January 20, 1885, in the French spoliation claims set out in the annexed findings by the court relating to the vessel snow Isabella, James Helm, master; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Whitman and 50 other citizens of Maine, remonstrating against any extension of the sovereignty of the United States over the Philippine Islands in any event, and over any other foreign territory without the free consent of the people thereof; which were referred to the Committee on the Philippines.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming presented a petition of sundry conductors on the Union Pacific Railroad in Wyoming, praying for the passage of the so-called initiative and referendum bill; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. THURSTON presented a petition of 90 citizens of Hansen, Nebr., praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors in Army canteens and in all Government buildings; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented petitions of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Hastings; the congregation of the First Baptist Church of Hastings; the Presbyterian Woman's Missionary Society of Hastings, and of the congregation of the First Congregational Church of Hastings, all in the State of Nebraska, praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the importation, manufacture, and sale of intoxicating liquors and opium in Hawaii; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. DANIEL presented a petition of the Young Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Wrights Chapel, Caroline County, Va., and a petition of the Rehobeth Young Woman's Christian Temperance Union, of Caroline County, Va., praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors in Army canteens, etc.; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. HALE. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10449) making appropriations to supply additional urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, and for other purposes, to report it with amendments, and I ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. HALE. I ask that the customary order take place, that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with and that the amendments of the committee be considered as they are reached in the reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine asks unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with and that the committee amendments be first considered. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill. The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to insert, after line 4, on page 3:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

For stationery for the Treasury Department and its several bureaus, $7,000.

The next amendment was to insert after the preceding amendment:

ENGRAVING AND PRINTING.

For labor and expenses of engraving and printing: For salaries of all necessary clerks and employees, other than plate printers and plate printers' assistants, $60,942.90, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, That no portion of this sum shall be expended for printing United States notes or Treasury notes of larger denomination than those that may be canceled or retired.

For wages of plate printers, at piece rates to be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, not to exceed the rates usually paid for such work, including the wages of printers' assistants at $1.25 a day each when employed, $91,399.25, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, That no portion of this sum shall be expended for printing United States notes or Treasury notes of larger denomination than those that may be canceled or retired.

For engravers' and printers' materials and other materials, except distinctive paper, and for miscellaneous expenses, $61,253.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert at the top of page 4:

PUBLIC PRINTING AND BINDING.

For printing and binding for the Treasury Department, $60,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert on page 4, after line 3:

For printing and binding for the Department of the Interior, $43,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3937) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate in the District of Columbia the disposal of certain refuse, and for other purposes," approved January 25, 1898, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

Mr. WARREN, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2610) to authorize the purchase of the property known as the Corcoran Art Gallery in the city of Washington, D. C., reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

GARFIELD HOSPITAL.

Mr. McMILLAN. I am directed by the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom the subject was referred, to report a joint resolution for the relief of Garfield Hospital, and I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The joint resolution (S. R. 114) for relief of Garfield Hospital was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That $1,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated and out of the revenues of the District of Columbia, in equal parts, for the maintenance of the isolating ward for minor contagious diseases at Garfield Memorial Hospital for the remainder of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TRIAL OF OFFENSES AGAINST THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. HOAR. I am directed by the Committee on Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4190) to provide for the removal to the proper district for trial of persons indicted for offenses against the United States, to report it favorably with amendments. I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendments reported by the Committee on the Judiciary were: In line 4, after the word "any," to insert "judicial;" in the same line, after the word "district," to insert "or in any Territory or the District of Columbia:" in line 5, after the word "other," to insert "judicial;" in the same line, after the word "district," to insert "or in any Territory or the District of Columbia;" in line 6, after the word "district," to insert "or Territory or the District of Columbia;" in line 9, after the word "of," to strike out "the" and insert "a:" in the same line, after the words "United States," to strike out "or a United States commissioner" and insert "court;" in line 10, after the word "the," to insert "judicial;" in the same line, after the word "district," to insert "or to a judge or justice of the highest court of the Territory or of the District of Columbia;" in line 12, after the word "judge," to insert "or;" in the same line, after the word "justice," to strike out "or commissioner;" in line 13, after the word "the" where it first occurs, to insert "judicial;" in the same line, after the word "district," to insert "or Territory or District of Columbia;" on page 2, line 2, after the word "judge," to insert "or;" in the same line, after the word "justice," to strike out "or commissioner;" in line 4, after the word "the" where it occurs the third time, to insert "judicial;" in line 5, after the word "district," to insert "or Territory or the District of Columbia;" in line 7, after the word "judge," to insert "or," and in the same line, after the word "justice," to strike out "or commissioner;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That where any person indicted for any crime or offense against the United States in any judicial district, or in any Territory or the District of Columbia, shall be or be found in any other judicial district or in any Territory or the District of Columbia, it shall be lawful, and it is hereby made the duty of the district attorney of the district or Territory or the District of Columbia in which such indictment is found, to deliver, or cause to be delivered, a copy of such indictment, certified by the clerk of the court in which the same is pending, to a judge or justice of a United States court in the judicial district or to a judge or justice of the highest court of the Territory or of the District of Columbia where such indicted person is or may be found; and thereupon it shall be the duty of such judge or justice to issue to the United States marshal of the judicial district or Territory or District of Columbia a warrant for the arrest of the person named in the indictment, and upon the return of the warrant with the body of the person so named, the judge or justice shall, upon being satisfied that the person arrested is the person indicted, make an order to the marshal directing the removal of such person to the judicial district or Territory or the District of Columbia wherein the indictment is pending, and it shall be the duty of the marshal to execute such order. In bailable cases the judge or justice before whom such proceedings are had may admit the defendant to bail for his appearance at the court to which he is held to answer the indictment.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EDWARD GOTTFRIED.

Mr. DAVIS. I am instructed by the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] on the 4th instant, to report it favorably with an amendment. I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution. The amendment reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations was, in line 7, after the word "memorial," to insert "and also copies of all correspondence between this Government and that of Peru and of any opinions or decisions of the Department of State."

Mr. COCKRELL. Now let the resolutions be read as proposed to be amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution as proposed to be amended will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be directed to send to the Senate a copy of the memorial of Edward Gottfried, a citizen of Wilkesbarre, Luzerne County, Pa., and late a consular agent of the United States of America at Trujillo, Peru, sworn to March 21, 1900, now on file in the State Department, together with all papers, letters, and exhibits attached to said memorial, and also copies of all correspondence between this Government and that of Peru, and of any opinions or decisions of the Department of State in connection with the action of a party of Peruvian revolutionists against the constitutional Government of Peru on and after August 28, 1898, the memorialist at the time being consular agent of the United States in Peru, the wrongdoers perpetrating, it is alleged, depredations on his property and injuries and indignities upon his person in violation of treaty rights.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

SAMUEL DORNON.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the bill (S. 3342) granting an increase of pension to Samuel Dornon be recommitted to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ELKINS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Interstate Commerce Commission be, and hereby is, directed to furnish to the Senate, as soon as practicable, the following facts and information:

First. The number of complaints of every sort and description which have been made to it against railroad companies each year during the last three years, the number of such complaints which have been disposed of informally by the commission without any formal hearing and determination each year during the last three years, and the number of such complaints which have come to a formal hearing and determination by the commission each year during the last three years.

Second. The total number of cases heard and determined by the commission during the last ten years, the number of such cases which have been appealed to the courts, the number of such cases in which the decisions of the commission have been sustained, the number of such cases in which the decisions of the commission have been reversed, and the number of such cases which have not been adjudicated.

EXPENSES OF THE PHILIPPINE COMMISSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on the Philippines, and ordered to be printed.

To the Senate:

In response to a resolution of the Senate of March 23, 1900, reading as follows:

"Resolved, That the President be, and he is hereby, requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to send to the Senate an itemized statement of the expenses of the Philippine Commission, together with a statement of the amount paid to each commissioner for his services and individual expenses."

I transmit herewith a report of the Secretary of State, with an accompanying statement, and have the honor to invite the attention of the Congress to the recommendation therein made as to the payment of the naval and military commissioners.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, April 16, 1900.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 12th instant approved and signed the act (S. 2679) declaring certain trestles of the Washington County Railroad Company to be lawful structures.

INTERNATIONAL UNION OF AMERICAN REPUBLICS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

In my message to Congress of December 5, 1899, referring to the insured maintenance for another period of ten years of the International Union of American Republics, I stated that "in view of this fact and of the numerous questions of general interest and common benefit to all of the Republics of America, some of which were considered by the first International American Conference, but not finally settled, and others which have since then grown to importance, it would seem expedient that the various Republics constituting the Union should be invited to hold at an early date another conference in the capital of one of the countries other than the United States, which has already enjoyed this honor."

Since then the Secretary of State has informed the governments of the various republics of this continent of our wish to see another conference convened, and has received formal favorable replies from some of them in response to my suggestion, and an expression of their willingness to send delegates to a second conference. From a majority of the other republics this Government has received oral assurances of a similar tenor, so that at the present time the recommendation made in my message is assured of the approval of the American republics.

In view of these facts and of the desirability that should the conference be called at an early date the expenses of the delegation to be sent by the United States may be provided for, I recommend to the urgent consideration of the Congress that it appropriate from any funds in the public Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be made immediately available, the sum of $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to meet the actual and necessary expenses of the delegates to the conference and of their salaried clerical assistants, said fund to be at the discretion of the Secretary of State.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, April 16, 1900.

LILLIAN CAPRON.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1905) granting an increase of pension to Lillian Capron, which was, in line 8, to strike out "forty" and insert "thirty."

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate nonconcur in the amendment of the House of Representatives and request a conference with the House on the bill and amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. GALLINGER, Mr. SHOUP, and Mr. LINDSAY were appointed.

AGNES K. CAPRON.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1906) granting an increase of pension to Agnes K. Capron, which was, in line 8, to strike out "forty" and insert "twenty-five."

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendment made by the House of Representatives and request a conference with the House on the bill and amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. GALLINGER, Mr. SHOUP, and Mr. LINDSAY were appointed.

WILLIAM PADGETT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2942) granting an increase of pension to William Padgett, which was, in line 8, to strike out "thirty" and insert "twenty."

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment made by the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (H. R. 1381) granting an increase of pension to J. J. Angel;

A bill (H. R. 1737) granting a pension to Cora I. Cromwell;

A bill (H. R. 1801) granting an increase of pension to Elijah Biddle;

A bill (H. R. 1943) granting an increase of pension to Simon Price;

A bill (H. R. 2331) granting an increase of pension to Festus Dickinson;

A bill (H. R. 3224) granting an increase of pension to Jeremiah B. Moore;

A bill (H. R. 3655) granting a pension to Margaret Burns;

A bill (H. R. 4368) granting a pension to Flora B. Hinds;

A bill (H. R. 4520) granting an increase of pension to George H. French;

A bill (H. R. 7624) granting an increase of pension to Pleasant H. McBride;

A bill (H. R. 8830) granting an increase of pension to William F. Boyakin; and

A bill (H. R. 9574) granting an increase of pension to Catharine A. Brown.

The bill (H. R. 10665) to provide for the use of timber and stone for domestic and industrial purposes in the Indian Territory was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 198) providing for the printing and distribution of the general report of the expedition of the steamer Fishhawk to Porto Rico, including the chapter relating to the fish and fisheries of Porto Rico, as contained in the Fish Commission Bulletin for 1900, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

CIVIL GOVERNMENT FOR ALASKA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further concurrent or other resolutions, the morning business is closed, and the Chair lays before the Senate the resolution reported by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. TURLEY] from the Committee on Privileges and Elections January 23, 1900, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the Hon. Matthew S. Quay is not entitled to take his seat in this body as a Senator from the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. CARTER. I ask that that resolution be informally laid aside, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 3419, known as the Alaskan bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Montana asks unanimous consent that the resolution which has been read be informally laid aside, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Alaskan bill. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3419) making further provision for a civil government for Alaska, and for other purposes.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, during the consideration of this bill on Saturday I gave notice that, if a full attendance of the Senate was present this morning, I would ask unanimous consent to fix the time for a final vote on this bill and all amendments pending at the time agreed upon.

Mr. STEWART. I object for the present. We can not fix the time until we get a little further along with some of the amendments.

Mr. CARTER. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] to the amendment previously offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER].

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Let it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] as a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] will be read.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the amendment which had been previously agreed to has been formally reconsidered for the purpose of permitting the Senator from Nevada to present his amendment; and I presume that, if his amendment is defeated, the other will be reinstated in its former position.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I should like to have the amendment read, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of section 26, on page 23, it is proposed to insert:

Provided further, That, subject only to such general limitations as may be necessary to exempt navigation from artificial obstructions, all land and shoal water above low tide on the shores, bays, and inlets of Bering Sea, within the jurisdiction of the United States, shall be subject to exploration for gold and other precious metals by citizens of the United States, or persons who have legally declared their intentions to become such, under such reasonable rules and regulations as the miners in organized districts may have heretofore made or may hereafter make governing the temporary possession thereof for exploration and mining purposes until otherwise provided by law: Provided further, That the rules and regulations established by the miners shall be in conformity with the mining laws of the United States, and all permits heretofore or hereafter granted authorizing any person or persons, corporation or company to excavate or mine under any of said waters are limited to lands below low tide: And provided further, That the reservation of a roadway 60 feet wide, under the tenth section of the act of May 14, 1898, entitled "An act extending the homestead laws and providing for right of way for railroads in the district of Alaska, and for other purposes," shall not apply to mineral lands or town sites.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I should like to hear the provision for which this is proposed as a substitute read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the amendment submitted by the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER], which was previously adopted and then reconsidered so that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] might offer his amendment to it.

The SECRETARY. On page 23, at the end of section 26, insert the following:

Provided further, That, subject only to such general limitations as may be necessary to exempt navigation from artificial obstructions, all land and shoal water below mean high tide on the shores, bays, and inlets of Bering Sea, within the jurisdiction of the United States, shall be subject to exploration for gold and other precious metals by citizens of the United States, or persons who have legally declared their intentions to become such, under such reasonable rules and regulations as the miners in organized mining districts may have heretofore made or may hereafter make governing the temporary possession thereof for exploration and mining purposes until otherwise provided by law: Provided further, That the rules and regulations established by the miners shall not be in conflict with the mining laws of the United States; and all permits heretofore granted authorizing any person or persons, corporation, or company to excavate or mine under any of said waters are hereby revoked and declared null and void.

BIG SANDY RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. ELKINS. I ask the Senator from Montana in charge of the pending bill to permit me to call up a bill which has been unanimously reported by the Committee on Commerce. It is Senate bill 4051, a short bill; and it is approved by the War Department.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. CARTER. I will yield providing the bill does not lead to debate.

Mr. ELKINS. I think it will not lead to debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from West Virginia asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill, which will be read for the information of the Senate, subject to objection.

The bill (S. 4051) to authorize the Ohio Valley Electric Railway Company to construct a bridge over the Big Sandy River from Kenova, W. Va., to Catlettsburg, Ky., was read; and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, in line 11, section 7, page 4, before the word "railway," to strike out "street;" so as to read:

SEC. 7. That all railway companies desiring the use of said bridge shall have and be entitled to equal rights and privileges relative to the passage of railway trains or cars over the same and over the approaches thereto, upon payment of a reasonable compensation for such use.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CIVIL GOVERNMENT FOR ALASKA.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3419) making further provision for a civil government for Alaska, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. BACON. As I understand, the last amendment read is the one that was previously adopted by the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is the one previously adopted.

Mr. BACON. It was offered by the Senator from Montana.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, of course the Senate understands that the effect of this amendment is to give the Secretary of War exclusive jurisdiction to grant all permits outside low-water mark at Cape Nome, of such dimensions and extent of privilege as he may see fit, so that he may grant miles square, if he desires, to anybody, and may refuse one and grant another. We should understand that it will be something pretty anomalous in our laws if such an amendment is to be adopted, and I hope we may have some discussion upon it before it is adopted.

Mr. DANIEL. Permits for what purpose?

Mr. WOLCOTT. For mining. The Senator from Virginia understands that the Secretary of War has no more authority to grant a permit for mining than has the Senator from Virginia as an individual—not the slightest—but because the law charges the War Department with the duty of protecting the harbors of the United States from being filled up or injured by improvident dredging or by other acts calculated to destroy the navigable channels or otherwise to interfere with navigation, this right is to be given him. All these permits from the War Department were simply to avoid the appearance of violation of the law. Although this is not a roadstead where navigation is in the slightest degree affected by the acts of miners, yet it was deemed wise, and properly so, that the Secretary of War should say to each comer, "Yes, you may dredge there, and you will not be prosecuted, because you are not interfering with the roadstead or with a navigable stream." Thereupon these permits were given—as to size, some being so many hundred feet and some so many miles. The Secretary of War made a very admirable report, in which he said every responsible man was given a permit to mine; but now, under this amendment, it could be claimed with propriety, because it will be sanctioned by legislative action, that the right exists in the Secretary of War to grant permits of varying sizes, dimensions, and terms of tenure for mining outside of the low-water mark. It is either open to the whole world, or else it should be put in some Department of this Government that deals with the question of the extraction of precious metals from soil over which we have any control. I merely want the Senate to understand it; that is all.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I quite agree with the Senator from Colorado. Either the amendment offered by himself or that offered by the Senator from Montana on a previous occasion ought to be the law and not the amendment which is now offered by the Senator from Nevada.

The Senator from Colorado, the Senate will remember, offered an amendment which provided for the Interior Department having jurisdiction of this matter, and the Senator from Montana offered an amendment which left it practically in the control of such regulations as might be made by miners upon the ground. Either one of those would have been a fair and practical and judicious method by which the matter could have been regulated by the Government. The Senate saw fit to choose the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana. I do not think it would have gone very far astray if it had taken either the one or the other. Each was a well-matured plan and each would have been a plan under which there could have been an impartial enjoyment of these mining rights by the public in general.

Mr. President, I was present Saturday when the unanimous consent was given for the reconsideration of the amendment of the Senator from Montana, which had been adopted after a very full discussion and a very full understanding by the Senate. I desire to repeat what I said then after the unanimous consent had been given, that if I had understood what was the particular amendment for which application was then made for unanimous consent for reconsideration, I should certainly have objected. The amendment having been adopted, it ought not to have been reconsidered without further consideration, in which the Senate should have been advised of the reasons.

As I understand the purpose of the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada, it is this, that so far as concerns lands above low mean tide the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana would have been practically in force, but that as to all below mean low tide there shall be this arbitrary and absolute power on the part of the Secretary of War to say who shall mine and who shall not. I can not conceive that there can be any possible defense for such a proposition. The only argument I understood the Senator from Nevada on Saturday to advance why there should be this regulation by the miners above low water and why they should not have the power to regulate below low water was, as stated by him, that below low water they could not set up monuments which would show where the different lines of demarcation were. If that argument applies to the lines set up by miners, it would certainly also apply to the lines which might be prescribed by the Secretary of War, and I can not see why there should be the reason in the one case which would not apply in the other.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator from Georgia allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. BACON. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. STEWART. I wish to modify my amendment.

Mr. BACON. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. STEWART. After the word "tide," in line 4 on page 2 of my amendment, I propose to insert the following:

No such permits shall exceed the area of placer claims under the mining laws.

Mr. BACON. I do not desire to detain the Senate. What I was particularly anxious to accomplish was simply that the Senate might be reminded of the fact that the amendment which it is sought to displace is the one which was adopted the other day after full debate, and I wish further to say that if that amendment is to be displaced at all I should very much prefer that it should be displaced by the amendment which had previously been offered by the Senator from Colorado rather than by the one which is offered by the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I can say to the Senator from Georgia that the differences between the Senator from Montana and myself upon the amendment which we discussed at some length the other day were such differences as might naturally arise upon a view of the question by men accustomed to deal with mining litigation. It was the opinion of the Senator from Montana, borne out by the history of the early mining districts in the United States, that, subject to existing law as to the size of claims and as to the annual work necessary to be done before claims could be patented, the intelligent miners upon the ground were the people best fitted to determine the rules and regulations as to the tenure of their claims.

Perhaps there are members of the Senate who may not fully understand to what extent this is done by the miners. For instance, the law as to lode claims now existing in the United States makes no provision as to the amount of development that shall be done within an area authorized by law to expose the lode, and the rules and customs of miners in the absence of State legislation prevails. In Colorado, for instance, a lode must be developed by a shaft 10 feet deep, which shall disclose the ore in rock in place. The law authorizes mining claims to be 1,500 feet in length by 600 feet in width, but permits the local laws and customs and the legislature of the State, within that provision, to limit them. Whereupon the State of Colorado limits in certain counties of the State mining claims to 1,500 feet in length by 300 feet in width, and in three of the counties of the State it limits the width of a mining claim to 50 feet of surface ground. So whatever is done by local laws and miners' customs is in limitation and not in enlargement of the Federal statute.

Therefore it seemed to me, in view of the fact that this is a new industry, involving a great outlay, requiring skilled knowledge, perhaps requiring aquatic knowledge as against land knowledge on the part of those who enter upon the waters of the sea to mine, and in view of the certainty of great litigation that must eventually ensue in any event if these fields shall prove to be rich, that it was wiser for the interests of those in this country who might send machinery and plants to that western country that before they went they should know that there were certain general rules and regulations which the Interior Department would apply to this anomalous and new sort of mining that would extend to the whole of Cape Nome.

It seemed to me it would be more conservative and would give miners and investors a better knowledge of what they might encounter, because it is true that along Cape Nome, which extends many miles, there may be twenty different mining districts, and one may say, "You must work your claim so constantly or expend so much money upon it, or you forfeit it; you must observe certain rules and regulations." And a mining district 10 miles beyond, and also upon the cape, may say, "The miners in this district need not do this," or must submit to other rules and regulations. The man here who one or two years before he does any mining has to buy perhaps from five to fifty thousand dollars' worth of machinery to take out there ought to have some general knowledge. This differs absolutely from the mining districts in the United States, where miners can make reasonable rules and regulations based upon long practice and experience. So it was thought wisest in the first instance for the Secretary to declare such rules and regulations.

The Senator from Montana and I differed as to that. It was a difference that any two mining lawyers might well encounter in consideration of the question. The Senator from Montana now informs me that he will accept, as an amendment to his amendment as adopted, something which to my mind covers the ground entirely. I am not dissatisfied with his amendment as it stands, except that I think it will work hardship upon people who start from here and need plants before they can enter upon the work. He offers to accept an amendment to this amendment. The amendment as adopted the other day is as follows:

That the rules and regulations established by the miners shall not be in conflict with the mining laws of the United States; and all permits heretofore granted authorizing any person or persons, corporation, or company to excavate or mine under any of said waters are hereby revoked and declared null and void.

The Senator from Montana suggests an amendment which seems to me to cover even the objection I made, which may or may not have been hypercritical, to add certain words at the end of line 13, so that it will read:

Provided further, That the rules and regulations established by the miners shall—be subject to such general rules as the Secretary may prescribe and shall not be in conflict with the mining laws of the United States.

That gives the Secretary of the Interior a general supervision over the whole district, so that the miners' rules and regulations shall not hamper unduly or be applicable to one district and not to another, and so people who go there, 8,000 miles, to do their mining may have some general idea in advance of what general rules and regulations they may be required to encounter. That is the amendment which the Senator from Montana suggests to me he is willing to accept if it shall be the sense of the Senate to adopt it.

Mr. RAWLINS. Mr. President, this is an interesting and important subject, especially to the miners. I was not present last week when this matter was under consideration. The sole difference, substantially, between the Senator from Montana and the Senator from Colorado seems to be whether these rules ought to be promulgated by the Secretary of the Interior or left entirely to the adoption and promulgation of the miners who may go to Alaska.

Mr. President, the rules which the miners make or the rules which the Secretary of the Interior may make, provided the view of the Senator from Colorado is adopted, it seems to me can not very much affect the interests of people who may desire here in this country to invest in machinery for the purpose of taking it to Alaska to engage in mining, for this reason: For instance, if it is a placer claim, the dimensions of that claim, say 20 acres, are defined by law. The rules that the miners may prescribe, which must not be inconsistent with the mining laws of the United States, relate only to the amount of work which shall be done, possibly to the marking of the claims by the posting of notices, filing of plats, or the erection of monuments, as the case may be.

Now, none of these things which will be prescribed by the miners, although they may differ in detail, one set of miners' regulations in one district differing from those in another, can affect one way or another any company or any person desiring to make an investment or to engage in mining in Alaska, for this reason: For instance, a claim is initiated by the filing and recording of a notice, and requiring so much work to be done within a certain time after the claim is initiated; and the marking of boundaries in one way or another. Any company proposing to invest will not do so until it has first established a right to the ground.

Mr. WOLCOTT. May I interrupt the Senator to enlarge, perhaps, a little that he may understand me as to the suggestion I made?

Mr. RAWLINS. Yes.

Mr. WOLCOTT. There is no trouble at all about the rules and regulations above high-water mark. That is all right. That shall be exactly as the mining law is. Below high-water mark, and upon so much of the soil as is twice a day covered by water, there are different discoveries and appliances and inventions intended to extract the gold from these places. They include boats, shallow boats, which shall dredge, take the soil in the boat itself, land it, and wash it upon shore. There are other inventions, which provide an endless chain in connection with some floating apparatus which shall raise the earth and send it to the mainland, where it shall be washed. There are also schemes now being carried out, where from the surface tunnels are driven under the waters of the sea along the auriferous bearing stratum that is supposed to have the pay dirt in largest quantity.

We are all arguing 8,000 miles away, but it may be that between those mining upon the land and those mining upon the water friction will arise as to the rights of the soil, as to easements which those mining at sea might have upon the land. I can well understand, and so can the Senator from Utah, that differences might arise between the two classes of mining, which are more radically different than lode and placer mining, because new and anomalous conditions arise. Under these circumstances it might help, not the investor so much as the miner himself, to have known rules, as if the Senator or I were to go to Cape Nome and take our kit and outfit with us. If we had ideas as to how we could mine under water, on lands covered by water part of the time, it would be to our advantage if there could be some general rules and regulations prescribed by the Interior Department. That is the whole reason for the amendment which the Senator from Montana says he will accept, and which I think important, but not vital.

Mr. RAWLINS. If I understand the point which is suggested by the Senator from Colorado, it is that mining in Alaska under water may differ somewhat from the ordinary conditions of mining as it exists upon land in this and other countries and that there ought to be rules, general in character, prescribed here in advance relating to certain easements, perhaps, pertaining to the shore. Of course, already we have in our mining laws means by which miners can acquire rights or easements for transportation of water and things of that kind. I suppose that under the code which is being adopted and under the laws in force and which have been extended or which will be extended to Alaska similar rights will apply to that country.

I do not know and I am not prepared to say whether those laws will be sufficient to secure all of the rights that the miner may need, operating under water, below high tide, for access to the shore. But, Mr. President, the only point I desire to make in this connection is not in antagonism to some reasonable rules in that regard. They ought to be provided, undoubtedly, by the miners or by legislation of Congress, or by the authority of the Secretary of the Interior, so that there shall be no conflict. Ordinarily the miners themselves, recognizing their common interest, the general interest, have been reasonable enough. They have been intelligent, educated men. They desire to promote the general interest of miners. That is their general interest, and they appreciate it. Ordinarily they adapt themselves to actual conditions. The miners upon the ground, mining engineers who go there, the advice of the attorneys who devote attention to that special condition will for the time being, in my judgment, provide rules which will better subserve all the interests of all the miners under all conditions there than will be adopted here by the Secretary of the Interior or could be adopted by us, even those who are here familiar with mining, now in advance of the actual necessities as they may develop in that country. So it seems to me that at present the safe and proper thing to do is to leave this to the miners. By and by we will hear from them. If difficulties arise, they will make suggestions for the solutions of those difficulties.

Mr. President, as to the amendment of the Senator from Nevada, proposing to grant unrestricted authority to the Secretary of War to grant rights over mining ground below low tide in the ocean, I think that is a reversal and a departure from the entire policy of this Government in relation to mining rights. It is a step which ought not to be taken. The ground for it, as I understand it to be stated by the Senator from Nevada, is that the miners could not mark upon the ground the boundaries of their claims in making their locations; that is, where the land was be ow mean low tide. The miners will make regulations just as conducive to an accurate ascertainment of the boundaries of their claims as the Secretary of War can in granting any license or permit to mine. Undoubtedly when they frame their regulations they will prescribe that certain notices describing the boundaries of their claims shall be recorded, perhaps that monuments shall be placed upon shore in such way as to indicate fairly the boundaries of the claim located by the miner under the ocean.

Indeed, in this country, upon land, the Supreme Court of the United States has held, while the statute requires actual marking of the boundaries upon the land, that wherever there are physical difficulties rendering it impossible to designate the corners by actual monuments, it may be dispensed with. There is nothing in the mining laws of the United States, according to the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, which precludes the doing of that thing which the Senator from Nevada, as I understand him, says renders the granting of this extraordinary authority to the Secretary of War necessary. For instance, in many cases in this country mining claims extend into the water or across rivers or upon an inaccessible mountain in such a way that it is impossible to designate or mark the boundaries actually upon the ground. Then the rule is that such reasonable designation of the boundaries as is possible under the physical circumstances will be allowed.

Mr. SCOTT. May I ask the Senator from Utah whether he is in favor of the amendment of the Senator from Montana or is opposing it?

Mr. RAWLINS. I am in favor of the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Montana and am opposed to the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. QUARLES. Mr. President, I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Utah to certain facts which may not be within his knowledge. I suppose, sir, that everyone is anxious to have the bottom of that ocean explored if it be true that there are auriferous deposits there, and no one would wish to throw any obstacle in the way of its proper exploration. It is in the interest of everybody that it should be made.

The fact exists that a considerable number of miners who are familiar with the situation up there have interested capital and have started in the preparation of very expensive experimental machinery for the purpose of making this exploration. Some of them have progressed to the extent of having already invested a considerable sum of money. They propose to go up there this summer with that machinery and explore that bottom and determine what there is there and make a practical examination of the whole field. They naturally, before they risk this amount of money in the machinery and in the great cost of getting it there, desire to know whether they are to have any concession or any right to use their machinery. Therefore it was that application was made to the Secretary of War to give them, not a permit to mine, but to exempt them from the penalty that they might incur under the statute of the United States which was referred to here the other day. They looked upon that simply as indicating to them that when their machinery got there they would have some place to put it.

Now, since the amendment of my friend from Montana was adopted these people have abandoned their plans entirely, because they can see no rights that they have, no concession, no place. They have abandoned this entire scheme, and it will stop right here, if you insist upon putting the territory below low-water mark in the hands of miners to make new regulations over a new subject and await their sweet pleasure to do it. Of course common sagacity would dictate that course.

Therefore, Mr. President, it is to be desired that this machinery should have an opportunity to make these explorations there. I suggest it is a matter of very great importance that this legislation should be shaped in such a way as to give those men some assurance that when they get there with their machinery, they are going to be recognized and not be left to the fancy or whim of the miners on land, who have had no experience with this matter and whose interests may be thought hostile to the people who are operating the machinery.

For instance, it has come to the attention of some of the gentlemen who are building these machines that there will be a theory entertained by the beach workers there that the operation of machinery farther out in the water may destroy the supply of gold-bearing sand and gravel that they are working on upon the shore. If that idea should take possession of the minds of the land workers, they would be hostile to the exploration out in deep water. The Senator can see that. These people who are investing their money say, "If you leave us to the tender mercy of those people on shore, they will be hostile to us. We will take our machinery there, and it will simply have to go into the scrap heap, or we shall be obliged to submit to such terms as the miners on shore may impose upon us, which may be unreasonable; and we will not build any machinery upon that uncertainty."

Now, I do not understand that this amendment confers any new power upon the Secretary of War. It does not give him any additional power. It simply by inference recognizes what we all recognize, that he has general control of any possible obstruction to navigation in any roadstead, bay, harbor, river, etc. So we are not conferring any new power upon him at all; but his concession is deemed sufficient by the gentlemen who are preparing this machinery to warrant them in going up there, in feeling that they will be recognized and have an opportunity to use their machinery.

Mr. RAWLINS. Mr. President, the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nevada——

Mr. CARTER. If the Senator from Utah will permit an interruption, I will state at this point that I understand the Senator from Nevada is prepared to withdraw his amendment and accept the amendment as it stood in the bill at the time he presented his amendment, with a slight change, to which, I think, all Senators will readily give assent; and if he will now withdraw his amendment, I will offer it.

Mr. STEWART. Let the Senator read what he has to suggest.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Montana what he proposes to amend. Does he propose to amend his amendment?

Mr. STEWART. He proposes to amend the original amendment.

Mr. CARTER. I propose to amend the original amendment, at the end of line 13 of the amendment.

Mr. SPOONER. Which amendment?

Mr. STEWART. The amendment of the Senator from Montana.

Mr. CARTER. I propose to insert at the end of line 13:

Be subject to such general rules as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe for mining below high tide, and shall.

So as to read:

And shall not be in conflict with the mining laws of the United States.

Mr. STEWART. My object was to make some provision so that we would have some certainty about it that they could mine below low tide. If the regulations of the Secretary of the Interior are confined to the beach and do not go generally to making laws, I have no objection to that amendment. It is necessary that there should be regulations in order to enable anybody to mine where the mining laws do not apply. I will withdraw my amendment if the Senator from Montana will amend his amendment as he has suggested. I ask leave to withdraw my amendment, if there is no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PERKINS in the chair). The Senator from Nevada asks permission to withdraw the amendment, which is now under consideration, proposed by him. The Chair hears no objection, and the amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. CARTER. In lieu of that amendment I offer what I send to the desk.

Mr. RAWLINS. Let the amendment be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana offers an amendment which will be read for the information of the Senate.

Mr. TELLER. Just read the amendment now proposed. I suppose it will not be necessary to read it all.

Mr. BATE. Read it all.

The SECRETARY. Insert at the end of line 13, after the word "shall," the words:

Be subject to such general rules as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe for mining below high tide, and shall.

Mr. RAWLINS. Now read that part of it beginning with the proviso?

The Secretary read as follows:

Provided further, That the rules and regulations established by the miners shall be subject to such general rules as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe for mining below high tide, and shall not be in conflict with the mining laws of the United States.

Mr. CARTER. There is likewise added to the amendment as previously offered that portion of the amendment of the Senator from Nevada which provides that the 60-foot road strip provided by another act shall not apply to mineral lands or town sites.

Mr. TELLER. You want to modify your amendment by adding that?

Mr. CARTER. By adding that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The modification will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Add the last proviso of the amendment presented by Mr. STEWART.

Mr. BERRY. To that part of it, when it is in order. I have an amendment to offer—to the provision relating to the reservation of the roadway.

Mr. TELLER. I wish the Senator from Montana would complete his amendment if he has not done so.

Mr. CARTER. The amendment is now completed.

Mr. TELLER. That is, it is now completed by adding the proviso which formed a part of the amendment of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART].

Mr. BERRY. Then my amendment to that would be in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana has been read, to which the Senator from Arkansas offers an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. BERRY. At the end of that part relating to the reservation of the roadway I move to insert what I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert the following:

It being the intention hereof that locations upon or claims to land within said reservation shall have originated only after the passage and taking effect of this act.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I should like to have it read again.

Mr. TELLER. In what line does that come?

Mr. SCOTT. Where does that come in?

Mr. BERRY. Immediately following that part of the amendment of the Senator from Nevada which relates to the reservation of the roadway.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I should like to have it read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will again read the proposed amendment.

Mr. PETTUS. Where does the amendment come in?

The SECRETARY. The amendment of the Senator from Nevada attached to the amendment of the Senator from Montana reads:

That the reservation of a roadway 60 feet wide, under the tenth section of the act of May 14, 1898, entitled "An act extending the homestead laws and providing for right of way for railroads in the district of Alaska, and for other purposes," shall not apply to mineral lands or town sites.

Then comes the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas:

It being the intention hereof that locations upon or claims to land within said reservation shall have originated only after the passage and taking effect of this act.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I was not present when this bill was discussed, having been absent from the Senate for some days, and I am somewhat embarrassed by not knowing exactly in what condition the bill has been placed.

Mr. CARTER. With reference to this particular amendment, to relieve the Senator's embarrassment somewhat, I will explain it. The Senator from Nevada, desiring to secure consideration for his amendment, which would permit the Secretary of War to continue the issuance of permits for shallow-water mining below high tide, asked unanimous consent that the amendment previously adopted should be formally reconsidered.

Mr. TELLER. That was your amendment?

Mr. CARTER. That my amendment should be formally reconsidered. That action was taken. Thereupon the Senator's amendment was considered until such time as an agreement was reached on the amendment now pending, whereupon the Senator from Nevada withdrew his amendment, and the amendment now pending is the one originally offered by me, with the suggestion of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. FAIRBANKS] and the suggestion of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] embodied in the amendment, providing that the Secretary of the Interior might prescribe general rules and regulations, and the further addition of an amendment providing that the 60-foot roadway should not apply to mineral lands or town sites.

Mr. SCOTT. And the further amendment by the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. TELLER. It seems to be the sentiment of the Senate that land under the water is not capable of being taken under the existing law. I do not know what examination has been made and what authority there is for that position, but that does not strike me as a very sure thing. I do not know but that I may be mistaken about it, but it strikes me that these shallow waters—and they are shallow, many of them not being over 15 or 18 inches deep—are just as appropriate under the existing mining laws as the country above, provided they are not in the harbor or roadstead or a place excepted in the statute where there can be no such thing as excavation and filling.

Now, I think we have got to go a little slow with this legislation. I understand that two classes are laying claims to this ground. One class lay claim under what they insist is a permit from the Secretary of War, which does not seem to be much of a permit. I think it is as much a permit as it is possible for the Secretary to justify himself in granting, and perhaps even more. Others claim to have taken it up under existing law. If a miner has gone and staked out 1,500 feet by 600 feet, which is a placer claim, and staked it, which he can do without any great inconvenience, either with a boat or with a pair of waders, I think he has got a title to it, provided he follows it up by actual possession as required. In the absence of any law up there he is not obliged to sink a shaft or do any considerable amount of work on it. All he has got to do is to signify his intention to work it and follow it with the proper appropriation.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I should like to have my colleague go a little further, if he will. As I understand the contention practically arising here, there was a little doubt as to the ground between high and low water.

Mr. TELLER. That is the 60-foot strip?

Mr. WOLCOTT. No, the difference between high water and low water. Now, this amendment removes th[e] uncertainty and gives you the area. But where the Secretary [of] War has assumed to interfere has been outside of low-water ma[rk].

Mr. TELLER. I understand.

Mr. WOLCOTT. And as to that, I should like to understand whether my colleague thinks that by any possibility the existing mining law could be held to be applicable to the soil under the waters of the ocean after the 3-mile limit, outside of low-water mark? That is the question.

Mr. TELLER. It could not absolutely. It is not public land, I know, in the sense that we use the term public land, because it is not surveyed except down to the water edge. But there is a general permission to mine anywhere on the lands of the United States, surveyed or unsurveyed.

Mr. WOLCOTT. That is right.

Mr. TELLER. They are not confined to land that is surveyed.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I agree to that entirely.

Mr. DAVIS. It is territorial sovereignty.

Mr. TELLER. There is just as much sovereignty over those 3 miles as over 3 miles the other way.

Mr. SCOTT. And they can stake it?

Mr. TELLER. If it is of such character that they can comply with the law by staking it, indicating where the claim is, I can not understand why they can not take it; and I believe that will be held by the courts. I do not see why they can not take it, because all these laws are made for the purpose of encouraging the extraction of gold from the earth. At one time it was silver and gold, but now it is gold.

Mr. CARTER. If the Senator will permit an interruption at that point I will make a suggestion for his consideration. It has been held by the Supreme Court of the United States, and I think it may be accepted as the settled law, that what we understand to be the tide land is held in trust by the Government of the United States for the future State, and that these tide lands are not subject to disposition by the United States Government as a part of the public domain. That was held very distinctly in the Seattle tide-land cases. Now, many of the land laws providing that the public domain shall be opened to exploration and location under the law relating to mines and mining, would the term "public domain" extend to the tide lands not owned by the Government, but held in trust by it for the State?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will suspend a moment while the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 2355) in relation to the suppression of insurrection in, and to the government of, the Philippine Islands, ceded by Spain to the United States by the treaty concluded at Paris on the 10th day of December, 1898.

Mr. LODGE. I ask that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside in order that the pending bill may be further considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, such will be taken as the sense of the Senate. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. TELLER. If the Government of the United States is holding these lands in trust, which I understand to some extent they are, by a general law, as well as by a special law, we can cover them and grant permits that they may be mined.

Mr. WOLCOTT. That is what this amendment does.

Mr. STEWART. That is what the amendment does.

Mr. TELLER. This amendment does that?

Mr. STEWART. Yes.

Mr. TELLER. Now, if they are in trust and the general law can not take effect on them because they are held in trust, you can not legislate for them by special act either.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I do not understand that the Supreme Court's decision was to the effect that general legislation would not take them out of that trust.

Mr. TELLER. It has been the policy of the Government of the United States to hold the tide lands for the States. There is no obligation whatever on the Government to give them to the States, and general legislation which in its terms will include them will be perfectly legal and perfectly proper, in my judgment. The general statute concerning miners and mining in the Territories covers that ground, it seems to me, unless there is an exception.

Mr. CARTER. The right to locate a piece of land under the mining laws of the United States presupposes the right to perfect a title under the location.

Mr. TELLER. Very good, Mr. President.

Mr. CARTER. The location being the initiatory step, if, as held by the Supreme Court, the tide lands are held in trust by the Government, can the United States in the interim, holding the fee in trust for a future State, grant a fee-simple title under a mining location to any citizen?

Mr. TELLER. If they can not do it by the general law, they can not do it now as proposed. There is the trouble the Senator is met with.

Mr. STEWART. But they do not propose to give them. They propose to give them the right of occupancy temporarily.

Mr. TELLER. You do not propose to give them a fee simple under any circumstances. A mining claim does not carry with it a fee simple.

Mr. STEWART. With the right to perfect it.

Mr. TELLER. With the right to perfect it at some time, it may be; but the title is in the Government in the great majority of claims to-day in many sections of the country and not in the holder. You can find claims in this country that have been occupied for fifty years by men who never got a patent. In 1865 the Government of the United States by statute—and that was the first mining statute ever enacted that applied to our Western country (there was in the early day one that was intended to apply to lead mines, but this was the first that applied to our Western country)—provided that it should be no defense, when two parties got into a controversy about a claim, that the title was in the United States. That statute was passed in February, 1865. Then came the statute of 1866, which was general in its terms.

I do not think there is any question about our right to grant a fee here if we see fit. In the first place, there is an assumption that this country is to be a State. There is no such assumption as that to be indulged in. It probably will not be a State for the next hundred years; certainly not unless this mining condition should be a permanent one, which nobody expects, for up to the present time they have found nothing but placer mines, and it is quite uncertain whether they will find any permanent mining there.

Mr. President, I want to get down to this question, which is a pretty important one. This amendment revokes the permit that the Secretary of War has granted. I suppose that is on the theory that he had not any right to grant the permit. I can not find any authority in his report. I have his report here before me. It is under this provision of the law and I want to read it:

> Whereas by section 10 of an act of Congress, approved March 3, 1899, entitled "An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public work on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes"—

Now, this is the provision of the statute—

> it is provided that it shall not be lawful to build or commence the building of any wharf, pier, dolphin, boom, weir, breakwater, bulkhead, jetty, or other structures in any port, roadstead, haven, harbor, canal, navigable river, or other water of the United States outside established harbor lines or where no harbor lines have been established, except on plans recommended by the Chief of Engineers and authorized by the Secretary of War; and "it shall not be lawful to excavate or fill, or in any manner to alter or modify the course, location, condition, or capacity of any port, roadstead, haven, harbor, canal, lake, harbor of refuge, or inclosure within the limits of any breakwater or of the channel of any navigable water of the United States, unless the work has been recommended by the Chief of Engineers and authorized by the Secretary of War prior to beginning the same."

Now, Mr. President, it is very apparent that that provision was never intended and contemplated by anybody to apply to a case out on the coast and away from the harbor—absolutely away—miles away. There is no harbor there; no pretense of a harbor; no pretense of a roadstead; no pretense of a haven. It is a shallow sea with a shore there that is probably 100 miles long—and more, too, I think—without a harbor in it. I am speaking now from general knowledge. That can not possibly have given any control or jurisdiction of the Secretary of War over it whatever, in my opinion.

The miner who goes there will be met with this permit, which I want to read. One has been granted and I will read it:

> And whereas Mr. George Max Esterly, of Seattle, Wash., has applied to the Secretary of War for permission to excavate or fill within the following-described area in Bering Sea, near the mouth of Snake River, Alaska, commencing at a point 200 feet east of the junction of mean low-tide water on Bering Sea and the mean low water at the mouth and on the east bank of Snake River, which latter empties into Bering Sea about 12 miles a little north of west of Cape Nome, in Alaska; then extending along on the said mean low-tide line in a general westerly direction for a distance of 2 miles, and extending out 500 feet from the mean low-tide line, which work has been recommended by the Chief of Engineers:
> Now, therefore, this is to certify that the Secretary of War hereby gives permission to said George Max Esterly and assigns to excavate or fill within the area described above in Bering Sea, near the mouth of Snake River, Alaska, upon the following condition:
>
> That the work herein permitted to be done shall not interfere with navigation or the rights of riparian owners, and shall be subject to the supervision and approval of the commanding general, Department of Alaska.
>
> Witness my hand this 1st day of March, 1900.
> [SEAL.] ELIHU ROOT,
> Secretary of War.

I submit that there is nothing there which authorizes the Secretary of War to give this man 2 miles on the coast, which is 100 acres and upward, with the right to mine at all, and if he gets a right he must get it under some other provision of law or he must get it under the miners' regulations, which are competent to give it.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Is that a right to mine under water?

Mr. TELLER. This is to mine under water.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Below low water.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Beyond where the tide ebbs?

Mr. TELLER. Beyond where the tide ebbs.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I call the attention of my colleague to the fact that the amendment of the Senator from Montana directly and in terms revokes every possible permit.

Mr. TELLER. That is one of the merits of the amendment. Now, in justice to the Secretary of War——

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. May I inquire still further, has the Secretary of War issued any permit to mine upon the beach where the tide goes out and leaves the beach open? He does not pretend to do that?

Mr. TELLER. I think not. I have not heard of him doing that.

Mr. WOLCOTT. No; he has not.

Mr. TELLER. He has not. Now, the Secretary of War sends us what he calls "Form No. 5." After reciting the statute, and then after reciting that somebody else wants 500 feet, covering a space of 1 mile by 500 feet, he says:

> This is to certify that the Secretary of War hereby gives unto said F. S. Wood and assigns permission to excavate and fill within the area described above, it being understood that this instrument is simply a permission to excavate and fill under said act, and is not exclusive within said area, and that it may be withdrawn as to future work at the discretion of the Secretary of War.
> This permission is given subject to the following condition:
> That the work herein permitted to be done shall not interfere with navigation or the rights of riparian owners, and shall be subject to the supervision and approval of the commanding general, Department of Alaska.

Mr. President, there were no riparian owners up there. I think undoubtedly the Secretary of War undertook to exercise a doubtful authority here for the purpose of encouraging the development of that region. But it will turn out whenever anybody attempts to mine that one of the people holding this permit will claim that he has an exclusive permission to mine; and whether he has or whether he has not, whether that is intended to be exclusive or not, the effect will be the same—to exclude all others.

I think, Mr. President, the amendment proposes a very correct thing, and that is, to dispense with that difficulty by declaring that the permits shall be ultimately revoked. If I understand the proposed amendment of the Senator from Montana, it is that there shall be the right of miners to establish the size of the claims and what shall be done on the claims below high tide or low tide.

Mr. CARTER. It ought to be mean high tide.

Mr. TELLER. Mean high tide on the shores.

Mr. CARTER. I suggest that addition to the amendment in a side note. Instead of saying "high tide" it should be "mean high tide."

Mr. TELLER. It does say mean high tide here.

Mr. CARTER. That is the change proposed on the margin of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be agreed to, if there be no objection.

Mr. TELLER. I believe it is perfectly safe to leave all these questions to the miners. I should myself very much prefer to leave it to the miners without any restriction whatever on the part of the Secretary. I should very much prefer the amendment as drawn by the Senator from Montana. It is possible that that is not objectionable when it is confined only to high-tide lands. I have had some experience with this question. I have seen the miners in their assemblies making their laws and regulations as to this business; and I am one of those who believe that on the ground they are better qualified to judge of what should be the condition than we are, and there need be no fear whatever but that they will do the right and proper thing. I am not going to contend very strenuously that that amendment should not be adopted, although I should have preferred it very much if the Senator had not modified it in that way.

I do not know what an active clerk down in the Interior Department, to whom this may be referred, may want to do. He may conclude that he will make up an entire new set of mining laws; and the less he knows about the subject the more certain he will be to insist upon making them. In the twenty-odd years I have been in public life I have found that when we came to deal with the question of mining, Senators and Members of the House of Representatives who knew least about the subject, who had the least possible information upon it, were always the most active and the most certain that they knew exactly what to do, though having no practical idea whatever of what ought to be done. We have been compelled for many years to refrain from attempting to secure fairly good amendments and what we wanted, because every time we attempted it we were met with such a general revision of the mining laws that we felt it would be better to—

Bear those ills we have
Than fly to others that we know not of.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President, the trouble with the Senators who do not know anything about this matter is that they have to vote; and when Senators who do not know about it disagree, how shall we know what vote we ought to cast?

Mr. TELLER. We have not very often disagreed. The present situation in the Senate is an exhibition of what we have had to encounter. Here is a question involving the interests of a great class of men, hardy men, miners, men who take their lives into their own hands, and who go out and develop that country with infinitely greater danger than any man incurs who goes to Manila or than men incurred who went to Santiago; and there is not the quarter of a quorum in this Chamber half the time when these questions are discussed. I do not say what there is now, but half the time when these questions are discussed there is not a quarter of a quorum present. When we come to vote every Senator is, of course, duty bound to vote; he votes as his general impression impels him to; and in nine cases out of ten he votes in a way that would inflict great hardship and great disaster upon the hardy class of people as to whose interests he votes.

I want to say just a few words about the hardy miner. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] the other day read a letter which is worth reading. I am sorry to say it, but I do not think there were more than five or six Senators who paid any attention to the reading of that letter, which he wrote some thirty-five years ago. In that letter he describes the people who go out and settle these new countries, and who create for themselves a system of mining laws which have grown up until courts have spoken of that system as the common law of mines.

When California was discovered there was nobody in the United States who knew anything about mining; there was no mining law in this country, common or uncommon, at that time. There was a mining law existing in Mexico. Our people went to California, and not finding the law just exactly to suit them, they made laws of their own. They ignored the Mexican law. They determined the size of claims, the conditions under which they should be appropriated, how they should be worked, and all that; and I venture to say that no legislative body in the world was as competent to deal with that question as those hardy miners in California.

Then when the discovery of gold occurred in Colorado in 1859, we had some of the original miners from California, but we had thousands of men who had never seen a mine, who did not know anything about a gold stratum, who had never seen any virgin gold except, perhaps, in a little vial that somebody might have brought from California; men unaccustomed to mining, unaccustomed to the hardships of such a country. They went to work, and with that common sense which always characterizes the American people they evolved a system of mining laws which exists practically to-day. They organized themselves into communities, perhaps not numerous in some instances, four or five hundred or a thousand; sometimes not so many and sometimes more. Having no law, being outside of an organized Territory, these people organized a government of their own; and from the fall of 1858, when the first settlement was made in Colorado, until the fall of 1861 a population consisting sometimes of fifty or sixty thousand governed themselves absolutely as a democracy in those communities.

They elected their judges; they elected their sheriffs; they elected their recorders; they elected their treasurers; they did everything that an organized community would do to maintain peace and order. They held their courts; they inflicted punishment, even the death penalty, if it was necessary. This was the result of proceedings regularly established and created by the people in their general assembly—I do not mean a regular legislative assembly, but by a pure democratic system, the people getting together in their miners' meetings and enacting laws providing what crimes should be punished and how they should be punished. Those courts, not self-constituted, but created by the community without any reference to the General Government or to any State government whatever, carried these laws into execution from the fall of 1858 to the fall of 1861, a period of three years.

Mr. President, it was my fortune to go to that country at that time, and my good fortune, too, for I think any man who has had the privilege of going into those new communities in the early days will, when he comes to look back at it, call it good fortune that he was there to see the American people exemplify their ability for self-government. There was not a State in the Union that did not have its representative there; there was not an isle of the sea nor any country on the face of the earth that did not have its representative there in harmonious community, dominated and controlled largely by what were called American citizens. They brought order out of confusion; they established everywhere a government that discharged all the duties of a government; that punished offenses; that protected life and property with as much certainty and with as much safety, Mr. President, as has been done in any State in the Union under a State government.

Mr. President, there has never been such an exemplification of American strength, American courage, and American good horse sense, if I may use the term, as was exhibited in those Western Territories. What they did in Colorado they did in Idaho, and what they did in Colorado they did in Montana, and in other sections of the great West.

I am willing to leave the determination of these matters to that class of people. The Senator from Montana and I feel alike when we come to that class of people. We know their capacity; we know their honesty; we know their conservative spirit.

I know it has grown to be the opinion of a great many people that the West contains a rough element. So it does, Mr. President. We had some rough people; and if we had not, the problem would not have been as difficult as it was, nor would our success have been as marked. We had men from all sections; we had men there who went to better their condition; who went there as American citizens ought to go anywhere; we had those who had escaped from the strong hand of the law and got out there, and yet we molded those people into a community that for decency and order and for obedience to law has no peer in any section of the country and never has had.

Mr. President, the State of Colorado, settled, as I say, by people from every portion of the Union—North, South, East, and West—from every isle of the sea, and from every nation of the world, when its first legislature met—I see the Senator from Idaho [Mr. SHOUP] looking at me, and he will bear witness to what I say—that when the first Territorial legislature met there was as much order then in the community as there was after it had enacted laws and put them in force.

Before there had been a surveyor's chain put upon the State of Colorado or any foot of it, when it was public land, the legislature of Colorado in its first session enacted a school law which made the schoolhouse free to all the children within its borders, then, I suppose, not sufficiently numerous to have filled half a dozen schools; but the members of that legislature knew that in time the hardy miner would bring his wife and his children, and so they provided early that all who came should have the benefit of free schools.

We have grown in strength; we have been represented on this floor for many years, as we have been in the other body; we have now a community composed of old settlers, their children, and those who have come since; but, Mr. President, no New England State, no State anywhere can show more order, greater stability, greater progress than can the State of Colorado and our adjoining mining States. Standing the lowest in illiteracy in the list of all the States is the State of Wyoming on our northern border, and we in Colorado would perhaps be still lower if it had not been that we have been blessed with a few of our Mexican brethren in the southern part of the State. Our towns are filled with the very flower of New England, of the Middle and also of the Southern States.

But, Mr. President, that has not much to do with this question. I have been led off into that line of thought because I know the proposition to submit to the miner the making of regulations to govern property not only for himself, but for the capital that goes into the mining country will be by some considered dangerous. I want to say that there need be no fear of that. The people who go there will be of the class who settled Colorado, Montana, Idaho, California, Utah, and Wyoming.

Before I conclude I want to call the attention of the Senator from Montana to section 26, where it is provided that—

The laws of the United States relating to mining claims, mineral locations, and rights incident thereto are hereby extended to the district of Alaska.

Mr. President, that is an absolutely unnecessary provision. The laws of the United States extend there now, and have extended there for some time. Therefore, referring to what I said about the right of the miners to take the land that is under water, I say, if any right could be conferred upon the citizens of that country or upon the occupants of it by the statutes of the United States, it was conferred some time ago and exists now. I suggest to the Senator that he does not need section 26 in the bill, and it ought to go out. I will not, however, go into that subject, as the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] is prepared to discuss the question at length. I know his views upon the subject, and I will leave that question for him to present; but it is important, considering the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH], for that would, in my opinion, be a repeal of the existing law, and so will section 26 to some extent.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, in that behalf, if the Senator will permit me a moment, the purpose of section 26 is to put the laws relating to mining in force in Alaska without any reservation, as they are in other Territories of the United States. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the act providing a civil government for Alaska, found in 23 Statutes at Large, page 24——

Mr. TELLER. In what year was that passed?

Mr. CARTER. In 1884. That law provides, and I read all there is of it:

And the laws of the United States relating to mining claims, and the rights incident thereto, shall, from and after the passage of this act, be in full force and effect in said district, under the administration thereof herein provided for, subject to such regulations as may be made by the Secretary of the Interior, approved by the President.

Upon reading that section extending the mining laws, it occurred to me that it was not entirely clear that the mining laws were extended to Alaska without reservation, because the act referred to, in the language I have just quoted, provides that they shall be in force under the administration provided for in that act, which would be a limited enforcement of the laws in that country. Further still, that they should be subject to such regulations as the Secretary of the Interior, with the approval of the President, might prescribe. In view of this unique section extending the mining laws, with qualifications vague, indefinite, and uncertain, it seemed proper that we should extend them without any reservation whatever.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the Senator whether the Secretary of the Interior ever made any regulations?

Mr. CARTER. I do not know of any regulations, nor are there any regulations worth speaking of in the act of which this is a part.

Mr. TELLER. I will not deal with that subject, but I will leave it to the Senator from Wisconsin, who will deal with it, and so I shall not undertake to answer the Senator now.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

Mr. TELLER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NELSON. I do not care to speak, but I simply call the attention of the Senator from Colorado to the fact that all the proviso of section 26 is retroactive legislation in its legal effect.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator is right in the suggestion, but I am going to leave that question to be discussed by the Senator from Wisconsin. Perhaps I may have something to say about it when he gets through.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, in view of the observations of the Senator from Colorado, I beg to call his attention to the case of Shively vs. Bowlby, reported at the October term, 1893, found in 152 United States, page 1. That construction of the law led to certain care in framing the amendment which was proposed to this bill. The syllabus of the case announces the principle as follows:

The United States, upon acquiring a Territory, whether by cession from one of the States or by treaty with a foreign country or by discovery and settlement, take the title and the dominion of lands below high-water mark of tide waters for the benefit of the whole people, and in trust for the future States to be created out of the Territory.

The opinion does not go to the extent of holding that the Government may not dispose of the land notwithstanding this trust. The statement is made on page 48 of the volume in the opinion to which reference has been made:

By the Constitution, as is now well settled, the United States, having rightfully acquired the Territories, and being the only Government which can impose laws upon them, have the entire dominion and sovereignty, national and municipal, Federal and State, over all the Territories, so long as they remain in a Territorial condition. * * *

We can not doubt, therefore, that Congress has the power to make grants of lands below high-water mark of navigable waters in any Territory of the United States, whenever it becomes necessary to do so in order to perform international obligations, or to effect the improvement of such lands for the promotion and convenience of commerce with foreign nations and among the several States, or to carry out other public purposes appropriate to the objects for which the United States hold the Territory. * * *

The Congress of the United States, in disposing of the public lands, has constantly acted upon the theory that those lands, whether in the interior or on the coast, above high-water mark, may be taken up by actual occupants in order to encourage the settlement of the country, but that the navigable waters and the soils under them, whether within or above the ebb and flow of the tide, shall be and remain public highways, and, being chiefly valuable for the public purposes of commerce, navigation, and fishery, and for the improvements necessary to secure and promote those purposes, shall not be granted away during the period of Territorial government, but, unless in case of some international duty or public exigency, shall be held by the United States, in trust for the future States, and shall vest in the several States, when organized and admitted into the Union, with all the powers and prerogatives appertaining to the older States in regard to such waters and soils within their respective jurisdiction; in short, shall not be disposed of piecemeal to individuals as private property, but shall be held as a whole for the purpose of being ultimately administered and dealt with for the public benefit by the State after it shall have become a completely organized community.

By referring to section 2319 of the Revised Statutes, it will be observed that mining claims may be located and purchased. I will read the section. It is as follows:

SEC. 2319. All valuable mineral deposits in lands belonging to the United States, both surveyed and unsurveyed, are hereby declared to be free and open to exploration and purchase, and the lands in which they are found to occupation and purchase by citizens of the United States and those who have declared their intention to become such, under regulations prescribed by law and according to the local customs or rules of miners in the several mining districts, so far as the same are applicable and not inconsistent with the laws of the United States.

It occurred to me in framing the amendment that we could not extend the mining laws to all of the shoal waters and tide lands in Alaska without a plain violation of the trust, the United States holding these lands for the future State. With that thought in mind, the amendment before the Senate was framed; and it will be perceived that it does not propose to grant anything more than a temporary easement. I will read the amendment at the place which illustrates the point:

That, subject only to such general limitations as may be necessary to exempt navigation from artificial obstructions, all land and shoal water below mean high tide on the shores, bays, and inlets of Bering Sea, within the jurisdiction of the United States, shall be subject to exploration for gold and other precious metals by citizens of the United States, or persons who have legally declared their intentions to become such, under such reasonable rules and regulations as the miners in organized mining districts may have heretofore made or may hereafter make governing the temporary possession thereof for exploration and mining purposes until otherwise provided by law.

It was assumed that this temporary possession might continue until Congress withdrew the privilege without giving a fee-simple title or a permanent property right to any of the miners in the particular lands over which this amendment would extend.

Mr. TELLER. I am not contesting the right of Congress to enact this legislation. I do not think there is any question about it. What I contended was that if we could not do it by special legislation, we might cover it by general legislation.

I want to say to the Senator that when I stated that these waters are not navigable waters of the United States, I said, if I recollect aright, that they were in depth from 15 inches upward, but they are none of them, as I understand, what might be called in navigable waters. A ship must lie out several miles, more than 3 miles, and discharge her cargo and passengers by lighters; which is quite a different thing from navigable waters. They are more like swamp lands. Perhaps at some places it may be deeper, but I have been told that within 3 miles a man can wade anywhere when the tide is out. I do not know how much tide there is there; there may be a large tide and there may not be; but it is utterly impossible, I am told, for any ship, even in high tide, to get up anywhere near the shore, and these sands which have been in controversy are only 300 feet out. Consequently they are in the shallow waters, nonnavigable waters, as I understand.

I had occasion, Mr. President, some years ago to examine the question of the right of a State to tide waters from a very notable case, the decision in which has been followed by the people of California for a great many years; and I have some general idea of what the rights of the States are. It was there contended that the Mexican Government could not have given away, or sold, or donated such lands because the State was entitled to them, and the Supreme Court of the United States held that they had an unquestioned right to do so.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President, I was very much pleased to hear the Senator from Colorado vindicate the men for whom he spoke, and I regret very much that after the Senator from Montana and the Senator from Nevada, with all their skill, had framed a bill which met the justice of the case and provided for the men who opened up the frontier, they have substantially abandoned their own wise work and destroyed it by making it subject to rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior. Of course, I want all men to be governed by the law as enacted by Congress, and that bill provides that they shall be; that all the rules and regulations the miners make shall be subject to the laws of the United States. That is right.

Mr. President, if you want to put any restrictions on these miners, I beseech you to put them on yourself. As I understand the last amendments that have been mixed and mingled, we come out of the amendment business with saying nothing about the grants that the Secretary of War has made. They are grants in every proper sense of the word. Some people call them permits, but they are grants for the time being. They do not purport to be a grant of the fee simple, but they are grants.

Mr. CARTER. If the Senator will permit me, he will observe at the top of page 2 of the amendment offered by me that all permits heretofore granted are expressly revoked.

Mr. PETTUS. You still hold on to that much of the amendment?

Mr. CARTER. We cling to that very tenaciously.

Mr. PETTUS. I am delighted that you do.

Senators ought to look at the law in reference to that subject. Here is a statute—I took the trouble to look it up—enacted at the last session, in which the words mines, silver, gold, copper, lead are not mentioned, or they were not thought of or dreamed of by the men who were writing the bill. It is the river and harbor act, and that is all it is, and that is all it intended to provide for.

Some Senators are entirely too sensitive when we come to speak of the head of one of these great Departments. Far be it from me to attribute any improper motive to the Secretary of War. I do not think of such a thing. I believe he is conducting his great office according to his best judgment; but he has made a great mistake. There can be no doubt of that. He tells us that in the river and harbor act, on page 1151 of the statutes of the last session of Congress, he finds his authority for making these grants.

There was nothing further from the intention of Congress than to legislate about mining. There is not one word in this act about mining—not a syllable. The lawmakers were talking about rivers and harbors and wharves and such things that went to the improvement of harbors and the like, and never once about mines at all. The very wording of the act does not allow any such construction as to authorize the Secretary of War to make a grant or give a permit. When you are talking about rivers and harbors you might as well construe an expression of that sort into the building of a house on dry land as to talk about mining. Section 10, from which all this authority is drawn as contended for by the Senator from Colorado, has been wrenched away from the purposes for which it was enacted to an entirely different purpose. Here it is, sir. I will ask the Secretary, if he pleases, to read section 10, so that Senators may hear it.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 10. That the creation of any obstruction not affirmatively authorized by Congress to the navigable capacity of any of the waters of the United States is hereby prohibited; and it shall not be lawful to build or commence the building of any wharf, pier, dolphin, boom, weir, breakwater, bulkhead, jetty, or other structures in any port, roadstead, haven, harbor, canal, navigable river, or other water of the United States, outside established harbor lines, or where no harbor lines have been established, except on plans recommended by the Chief of Engineers and authorized by the Secretary of War; and it shall not be lawful to excavate or fill, or in any manner to alter or modify the course, location, condition, or capacity of any port, roadstead, haven, harbor, canal, lake, harbor of refuge, or inclosure within the limits of any breakwater, or of the channel of any navigable water of the United States, unless the work has been recommended by the Chief of Engineers and authorized by the Secretary of War prior to beginning the same.

Mr. PETTUS. In all those words can you by any possible torture conceive that they were talking about mining? No lawyer, it seems to me, could possibly understand that that related to mining. But as the Senator from Montana assures me that he has adhered to that part of his amendment which relates to these permits, I will pass it by, only saying this:

Mr. President, it is a dangerous thing to permit any one man to grant any such a right as is talked of in these permits. It ought not to be done. If a bridge is to be built across a navigable stream, Congress has always exercised that jurisdiction itself properly, and it ought never to be permitted to go into the power of any one man to grant such permits as these. It leads directly to the prostitution of the Government to bad purposes. I am not accusing the Secretary of War of any such thing; I have no idea that such a thought crossed his mind; but if you indulge in granting that one-man power you will prostitute the Government to bad purposes.

Now, as to the other branch of the question, it seems to me the Senator from Montana has yielded against his conviction as to what ought to be done. I am amazed that the Senator from Nevada, after what he said about these miners, after what he said about their capacity for self-government, should insist that the Secretary of War ought to make rules and regulations for their government. It is impossible that he should do so wisely. He can not do it, because he can not understand the subject, and no man can understand the subject unless he is on the ground and sees the necessities of the case.

If the Senator from Nevada, who associated with these men in his boyhood days as I did, thinks they are so wise, so just, and have so much capacity to enforce the law, as they have, why put them under rules and regulations made by a man who can not possibly understand the subject? I hope the Senator from Montana will reconsider what he has done and go back to the wise provision he himself wrote.

Mr. SHOUP. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Montana if he can not amend his proposition so as to provide that all mining lands above low tide shall be regulated in one way, and submarine mining, which is a class of mining entirely different, the manner of work being entirely different, regulated in another way? In one instance ordinary mining tools are employed; in the other it requires a very large investment for machinery. I ask the Senator if he can not amend his proposition so as to divide the method of applying rules to the government of these two classes of mining? I would also ask the Senator if it would not be well to consider the suggestion of striking out "Cape Nome" and have it apply to all the shore lines of Alaska?

Mr. CARTER. The suggestions of the Senator from Idaho are very wise. I call his attention to the fact, as he was out of the Chamber at the time, that the amendment recently presented by me practically covers the points he has in mind. This amendment extends to "all land and shoal water below mean high tide on the shores, bays, and inlets of Bering Sea, within the jurisdiction of the United States," as the Senator will observe. It further provides, as finally amended, and that is the particular part to which the Senator from Alabama objects, that the Secretary of the Interior may make general rules and regulations which would, I assume, apply to the land constantly submerged by water; that is, the land below low water. The miners unquestionably would enforce their own regulations above the low-tide line. This combination, allowing the Secretary of the Interior to prescribe general rules and the miners permitted to legislate within those rules, when not in conflict with the laws of the United States, seems to be all in all the best general line of provisions we can make at this time for this unique situation.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the Senator from Montana allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly, with pleasure.

Mr. SCOTT. Do I understand that the rule to govern the mining claims shall be that a miner is entitled to stake out a claim extending out so far as the low tide? For instance, on the coast or on the beach when the tide is out could a miner put up his monuments or his stakes and claim out to the extent of the low tide?

Mr. CARTER. In reply to the Senator, I will say that we give to the miners the right of temporary possession for the purposes of exploration and mining below mean high tide on the shores, bays, and inlets of Bering Sea, subject to such rules and regulations as they may themselves prescribe not in conflict with the laws of the United States or the general rules prescribed by the Interior Department. I assume, put into practical operation, that the miners will prescribe rules whereby claims can be staked or the outlines in some manner fairly determined so that a person passing can ascertain where the location is.

Below the low-tide line another condition will exist. As it is suggested by the Senator from Nevada, it will be impossible to maintain stakes on that tempestuous coast beyond the low-tide line. I am told that breakers come over that shoal water occasionally 4 or 5 or 6 or 8 feet in height, and that it will be impossible to moor a dredge or anchor it out a hundred feet from the shore and accomplish anything in the way of dredging at that point; that the eternal and violent motion of the water would prevent such operations.

Now, the manner in which the Secretary of the Interior can prescribe rules and regulations for everybody who has a dredge coming in there anywhere to go in and get gold out of the sands as best he may remains for the Secretary of the Interior to solve. It is a problem we relegate to him. We make the rule which he prescribes a general rule, however; and in that I believe we do better than to allow the Secretary of War to grant special permits. There may not be many dredging machines brought there; there may be a great many; but all hands will operate under the same general rules. No special favors will be granted to anyone; and before persons invest in machinery with a view of going to those shoal waters for the purpose of mining they will undoubtedly be advised of the general rule which the Secretary intends to prescribe to govern their action.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Montana allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CARTER. I will be glad to answer the question.

Mr. SPOONER. As I understand his amendment, the primary rules are made by the miners, and his amendment gives to the Secretary of the Interior only power to review and modify those rules from time to time. Am I wrong about that?

Mr. CARTER. I think the Senator is in error in that respect.

Mr. SPOONER. I mean below low water.

Mr. CARTER. I think the Senator is in error in that respect. The local rules and regulations of the miners will be subject to two governing forces—one the general rules prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior; the other the mining laws of the United States.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator permit his amendment to be read from the desk?

Mr. CARTER. I should be glad to have it read.

The SECRETARY. At end of section 26 insert the following:

Provided further, That, subject only to such general limitations as may be necessary to exempt navigation from artificial obstructions, all land and shoal water below mean high tide on the shores, bays, and inlets of Bering Sea, within the jurisdiction of the United States, shall be subject to exploration for gold and other precious metals by citizens of the United States, or persons who have legally declared their intentions to become such, under such reasonable rules and regulations as the miners in organized mining districts may have heretofore made or may hereafter make governing the temporary possession thereof for exploration and mining purposes until otherwise provided by law: Provided further, That the rules and regulations established by the miners shall be subject to such general rules as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe for mining below mean high tide, and shall not be in conflict with the mining laws of the United States; and all permits heretofore granted authorizing any person or persons, corporation, or company to excavate or mine under any of said waters are hereby revoked and declared null and void. And the reservation of a roadway 60 feet wide, under the tenth section of the act of May 14, 1898, entitled "An act extending the homestead laws and providing for right of way for railroads in the district of Alaska, and for other purposes," shall not apply to mineral lands or town sites.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, practically, it seems to me, this leaves the matter of regulating mining operations below low tide to the miners. I agree with the tributes which have been paid by Senators who are familiar with the administration of rules made by miners to their justice, but I doubt very much the wisdom of this amendment for this reason: The great body of miners who make the mining rules will be miners upon land. There will be, I suppose, comparatively few of them mining below the tide line. That will be done by machinery. It will be done by a class of men who will not participate much, probably, in making the mining rules. At any rate, the vast majority of men who make the mining rules will be men who mine upon land.

The amendment in itself grants authority, authority granted by Congress, to explore for gold and precious metals in the waters below the tide line; but it places the regulations entirely in the hands of the miners on the land. I can understand very well how miners regulating matters of that sort amongst themselves, where they have a mutual interest, may well be trusted to take care of the common interest, but this is a proposition to intrust to them the regulation of a power granted by the United States for exploration in a field which they do not enter. I have heard no answer made to the suggestion presented a little time ago by my colleague, in which I think there is very great force, that the miners upon the land might conceive it to be detrimental to their interest that explorations should be made below the tide line. As he stated, they mine upon the shore during the day. The next morning the excavations which have been made the day before are filled, and filled with gold-bearing sand, constantly replenished; and it does not require much imagination to conceive that the miners might not be willing that large operations should be conducted out in the water, which would interfere somewhat, or possibly might interfere, with this constant replenishing of a fresh supply from under the water for their mining operations.

I think we ought to give, if we are to grant at all the power to mine under water, to some Government authority here the regulation thereof; I think it would be well enough to give it to the Secretary of the Interior. But I believe as this amendment is drawn it will practically prevent in an efficient way explorations under the water. The Secretary of the Interior, in the very nature of things, can not at the outset make rules unless they are so general as to be incapable of efficient enforcement, and he certainly can not, in a single season, be expected to revise the rules made by the miners, because it is so remote that it will be impossible for him in a season—and the seasons there are very short—to be communicated with, to have the rules communicated to him and the objections presented to him, with an opportunity to review them and pass upon them and put in force such regulations as he sees fit.

I think the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada is the fair and proper amendment. It leaves to the miners, as it should be left to them, to make regulations governing the mining operations upon the land where they mine, leaving it to the Secretary of the Interior, or, if it should be deemed wiser, to the Secretary of War, to make the regulations under which this power granted by Congress to explore in the waters for gold shall be exercised.

Mr. TILLMAN. I should like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin if it has occurred to him—and if not, I will present it and ask his opinion of it—as to whether or not there might not be more equity and justice to the miners on the land in putting a limitation on the depth of the water rather than putting it at the line of low tide? For instance, if there is a constant replenishing of the excavations that the land miner is making, with new crops of gold coming in at night with the tide, I can very readily see that he would object very strenuously to some fellow who had a boat—a large dredge—taking this crop of dollars, so to speak, and leaving him no share in it. That is very different from the right of the land miner, who might get a yawl or little boat but who might not be able to get a large dredge or a steam pump or something of that sort, to go out to certain depths in front of his claim and drop down a trawl—like you are pulling for oysters, for instance—and wind it up by a windlass and bring some of the auriferous earth within his reach.

I think there is a right that ought to be reserved to the land miner as against the capitalist; in other words, that anybody who risks his life in that climate, seeking gold, ought to have an opportunity, as far as this Government can allow, to get as much as his individual effort would permit him to get. I think a limitation as to the depth of water beyond which the Secretary of the War or the Secretary of the Interior shall govern and control, not to the edge of low tide, but to go a little farther, 10 feet or 8 feet, somewhere beyond the usual depth that a land miner could ever reach, would better divide the thing and give both a chance.

Mr. SPOONER. There is some force in what the Senator suggests, but my understanding is that the character of the surf there is such that it is impossible to mine in yawls and small boats.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am not talking about mining, but I am talking about getting the dirt to the shore to wash it out. I speak of getting the auriferous earth to the shore.

There is another phase of this subject about which I happen to know a little by reason of the fact that we in our State mine phosphate with dredges. The wash boat is alongside of the dredge, and after the deposit of phosphate, mixed with earth, in the percentage of 1 to 10 or 1 to 5, varying as they happen to strike the strata, a big dipper full is thrown into the machine and the earth washed right back to cover up the excavation. You can very readily see that if this washing of the auriferous earth by dredging and by pumping out in the water permits the earth to go immediately back, it covers up and to that extent dilutes the auriferous earth and makes mining ever less and less remunerative.

On the other hand, if all the earth were carried to the shore and the débris or the sand with no gold in it were washed and deposited there, you would by a proper system of demarcation wash the whole surface as far as you could reach by means of steam pumps or by dredges, whereas under any promiscuous system, turning loose a lot of greedy fellows in there with dredges to go about and get all sorts of potholes and other places, where they would wash the sand, unless there is some system, there would be a great deal of gold lost. I think, with some limitation as to the depth beyond which a land miner or rather inside which a water miner shall not go, you will have reached possibly the best solution as to the equities of this business and leave the individual a fair opportunity to get his share of the gold, or not shut him out from competition with the capitalist who goes there with dredges and steam pumps.

Mr. SPOONER. I have supposed that could be wisely left to the executive officer who might be selected by law to make the regulations. I have not thought that exclusive rights were to be given under this law anyway to mine under the water. I supposed that the land miner, if he chose to do it, would be permitted as anyone else to mine under the water or to explore the harbor for auriferous earth.

Mr. TILLMAN. But if you put the land miner to the edge of the water, at least do not allow him to go into the water or to use appliances under the water without a permit, you put him at a disadvantage.

Mr. SPOONER. Possibly so.

Mr. TILLMAN. I think a limitation as to the depth where the jurisdiction of the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Interior shall begin to control and leave the land miners to govern the balance within reasonable limitations would be the most equitable way of settling this.

Mr. SPOONER. I think there is value in the suggestion. I do think that some officer of the Government should be charged with the duty of regulating the exploration under the water for gold-bearing earth, for gravel.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have no objection to the general scheme. The only danger I see that might possibly come to pass, and I do not know that I ought even to hint at such a thing, is that there might be favoritism exercised by that officer, unless the regulations were general and of such a character as would permit the smaller capitalist to compete on the same terms of equality with one who had half a million dollars' worth of dredges and a machine there with steam pumps or other appliances which would reach this earth under the water as against the particular individual with his little boat and whatever other appliances he might be enabled to obtain.

Mr. SPOONER. I have never supposed that it was in contemplation with the Senate to authorize any officer to grant exclusive permits at all to miners.

Mr. TILLMAN. Then you can readily see that unless there is some systematic mining done there under governmental control the loss that I have just spoken of will occur by the detritus or sand from which gold is extracted being poured right back into the water to cover up that which has not been mined, and therefore it looks to me that in order to save this gold for the uses of civilization, because it is becoming a very important matter in our day and time, there ought to be some legislation which will prohibit the destruction of this auriferous bearing sand by pouring it back on top of it by dredgers who will rush in there to get all the gold they can, without caring anything about what is left or whether they have got half of it or not, as you can readily understand.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. SPOONER. Go on.

Mr. SCOTT. If the Senator will leave that to the miners I am sure that they will take care of the small interest to the exclusion of the capitalists.

Mr. TILLMAN. I was trying in my feeble way to help the individual miner against the capitalist who will go there with a great steam dredge and a steam pump, and ruin the mines of the poor people who have gone up there, and who have received frozen noses, frozen toes, and frozen limbs, and have risked their life and everything else in the search for gold.

Mr. SPOONER. I have not the slightest objection to the limit suggested by the Senator from South Carolina. That was not the point of my suggestion. I suppose the capitalist can have his nose frozen as well as a man who is not a capitalist. I think if men invest money in machinery, and go up there for the purpose of exploring under the water for gold, they should have some reasonable assurance——

Mr. TILLMAN. I want reasonable protection given.

Mr. SPOONER. They should have some reasonable assurance from Congress that, when they have reached there with their machinery, expensive in itself and very expensive in the matter of transportation, they may utilize it. The suggestion made by the Senator from West Virginia that the miners will take care of the little interests is the very thought which led me to make the suggestion that they ought not to be left entirely to the regulation of the miners who control the operations upon the land and who will be in a large majority. Granting that this amendment, if adopted, will aid to explore under the water for gold, I think we should give to some executive officer of the Government power to regulate the operations under the water and not leave these gentlemen entirely subject to the control of the mining rules and regulations which will prevail upon the land. I have no objection at all to the limitation suggested by the Senator from South Carolina. I think it may be a wise one and a just one. I believe these operations will be conducted some way out from the shore—I mean by dredges and suction machinery and all that—because they must go out very far in order to be able to work at all, as I understand it, on account of the character of the surf.

Mr. TILLMAN. Would the Senator suggest some limit as to the depth within which the land miner would have absolute control and beyond which the rules and regulations of the Secretary of the Interior should govern?

Mr. SPOONER. I am not sufficiently familiar with the beach there and I am not a miner. I am not able to make a suggestion that I would regard as of value.

Mr. TILLMAN. Neither am I, but just as a matter of common sense I would suppose that any dredge of sufficient power to accomplish much could not come much within a depth of 10 feet at low tide. I do not know what the rise of the tide is. Does anyone else know? Does the Senator from Montana know what the rise of the tide is?

Mr. CARTER. I suppose at times the tide at that point of Bering Sea is 20 feet.

Mr. TILLMAN. Is that a matter of the wind driving it up, or is it a matter of the rise of the tide proper?

Mr. CARTER. It is said to be a very boisterous sea of water, so rough that it is difficult to get lighters through to land the goods from the ships at anchor a mile from the shore. It is said by those who have been there that no dredge boat can live in that surf.

This is a simple proposition. The Senator from Wisconsin suggests that these gentlemen will go up there with dredging machines. So they may, but they will be compelled to settle with the miner on the shore and acquire from him a right to plant their machines, precisely as the capitalist would be compelled, if desirous of conducting a manufacturing enterprise in Washington, to buy a lot from somebody who owned it. It is not in the line of possibility for men to go up and anchor boats out in that water and dredge for gold. Anyone familiar with the seashore anywhere, even in the placid waters of Cape May or Atlantic City, can readily tell that no one can go out and anchor a boat and go to dredging sand and trying to save gold out there.

It is my own judgment that most of these dredgers will come back. The dredgers will return and the dredges will be left up there as ordinary wrecks along the shore if they expect to go out and anchor their boats in the surf and do the dredging in that way. They will be compelled to go along the shore and purchase from the miners who have located claims there sufficient ground upon which to erect their machinery, and then endeavor to suck the sand from under the sea at as great distance as they can possibly reach.

The whole matter is experimental. We can not provide rules or regulations as to where the nozzle of the dredge may extend, as to where the jurisdiction of one officer shall begin and another terminate. I think we have in this amendment fairly provided for all that can be expected. Let the Secretary of the Interior promulgate general rules providing that the dredgers, as between themselves and the miners on the shore, must make an equitable adjustment in some manner or other. That will be done in the absence of a rule. The way it will be operated in a practical sense will be that the man with the dredge going from Wisconsin or Montana or elsewhere will find some miner who has a claim on the shore, and either give an interest in the dredge and take an interest in the claim or buy him out and take possession and go to work as he would start a new factory in New York or Washington or any other city, first buying a site upon which to put his plant.

This matter will settle itself. The amendment here provides all the rules and regulations necessary. We allow them to go in and temporarily occupy the ground. The Secretary of the Interior can make general rules, the miners to make rules not in conflict with those general rules. The whole matter will work itself out in very nice form, and I think those who do not invest in the dredging business will be more happy next winter than those who will invest in it.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the Senator from Montana allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. SCOTT. Is it not true that in a mining district a miner may take a water claim as well as a placer claim or he may take a lead claim, making three distinct locations? Just as the Senator from Montana has said, these gentlemen from Wisconsin will go up there with their appliances for dredging out in the ocean. They first would have to get permission of the miner who had the water claim or the water right before they could use the appliances for mining or taking up the sand in the ocean.

Mr. President, the only thing that I want to do in regard to this bill is to perfect it in such a way that the prospector, the man who goes in that country with a sack over his shoulder or a piece of flitch and a few hard tack, may be protected in his rights. I have been interested in mining for forty years. That is the man whom I want to see protected in this bill. I do not think that the man with money or the man with appliances for sucking up the sand should in any way take his right from the miner who has gone up there and located his claim, either water, placer, or otherwise. That is the only object that I have in this measure.

Mr. CARTER. In reply to the Senator from South Carolina I made the statement that the tides at times were 20 feet in height at that point. Of course that statement is to be qualified. I presume the average tide there is the average tide of Bering Sea, which is from 3 to 7 feet.

Mr. SCOTT. An average of about 4.

Mr. CARTER. An average of 4 feet; possibly an average of 3; but the open sea, being in no sense chained or broken in its force, drives water in there in enormous banks at times and would, I assume, wreck any sort of craft that happened to be anchored in the shoal water.

Mr. PERKINS. There is no holding ground.

Mr. CARTER. There is no holding ground, as the Senator from California suggests.

Mr. TILLMAN. I should like to direct the attention of the Senator from Montana to this phase of it: We will suppose the provision in regard to the present low tide to continue as a limitation of the rights of the land miners. Now, it is not necessary to anchor your dredge, or your wash boat, or your steam pump, because you can simply run right up while the tide is high and put it at low-tide mark and leave it there, fastening it there, banking it there, and it then becomes a fixture on that coast that could only be displaced by a very severe storm. The water might break over it.

Mr. PERKINS. The Senator coming from the seacoast is aware that the surf rolls in, especially in shallow water, breaking perhaps at several hundred feet, and there being no holding ground for an anchor, to use a nautical term.

Mr. TILLMAN. I was not speaking about anchoring. I was talking about getting the dredge or boat ashore, so to speak; of getting it fastened on the shore by running it aground at low-water mark; in other words, just beyond the jurisdiction of the land miner. Then he has a base from which to begin his operations out in the water with his steam nozzle or pump, not going out, but pumping sand in and pumping gold along with it, and washing it right there on the edge.

I only know, as I said, a little about this question of mining by the phosphate miners in our State. I have seen them mine there in 27 feet of water. There was a dredge company which sent over a dredge with an endless chain of buckets that scooped down and brought up a ton or a ton and a half, and each bucket coming back up the ladder would drop its contents over into a washing apparatus that sent all the dirt back into the ocean or into the bay in which they were mining and left the phosphate rock as the result of the operation. Of course this was in an estuary some 10 miles broad, an inlet of the sea that was an average of 18 to 20 feet in depth.

All the phosphate we have ever gotten there, over a million tons, was brought up either by the dipper dredge or this dredge of which I speak. I do not see why, except for the safety of the anchorage, similar boats can not go beyond; but if the open ocean is there, as I know it is, with the danger to such machinery or such vessels from the storms that would come, then the only appliance that would appear to me to be safe would be something that would anchor this machinery on the shore and then send off and draw in the earth with the gold in it to the edge of the ocean and there wash the dirt out and get the gold, or else have it located on the shore entirely, and put out your steam pump with the nozzles and bring it back.

It is something about which I know nothing. I am only interested, as the Senator from West Virginia states, in the poor devil who has gone up there with a pick and shovel and his pan and his few pounds of bacon. I do not want to see him hedged in by a limitation that will allow some fellow to come up and get right out there just below low tide and take all the gold and leave him nothing but the hardship.

Mr. BERRY. I believe the question is on the amendment offered by myself.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. BERRY. That amendment refers entirely to the road reservation of 60 feet. If I understand correctly, in 1898 there was an act of Congress which reserved 60 feet for a roadway. The Secretary of the Interior held that that 60 feet was not subject to mining claims location, thereby preventing a great many parties who otherwise would have located claims from doing so. But I am told by a member of the House that some company did locate a claim there, and probably a valuable one, contrary to the order of the Secretary of the Interior and contrary to what the Secretary ruled the law to be. In other words, while he was keeping all the world back by this ruling a particular company went there and made a location.

Now, it is proposed by the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana to open up that roadway to the location of mining claims. The object and purpose of my amendment is simply to provide that the location shall be made after the passage of the law. I do not want to ratify or confirm the location made by particular parties while all the balance of the world was kept back.

I am told by the Senator from Montana, to use not exactly his language, but to the effect, that the Secretary of the Interior has taken back his ruling very recently and said he will hold the matter open as to whether the roadway was subject to the location of these mineral claims. But he had so ruled. He had thereby kept the world out in making a location. This company, contrary to his ruling, went in there and got some kind of a claim, and now they seek to have it confirmed by the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana.

My amendment simply provides that locations on this roadway shall be made after the passage of this law. That gives all the world an even chance and gives no special advantage to men who went there contrary to what the Secretary of the Interior held to be the law and got some kind of a claim. I do not want to legislate for anybody, but I want the law to bear equally upon everybody; and when the law passes opening the roadway, I desire every American citizen to have an equal chance and no one to have a better chance by reason of having made a location contrary to the law or the ruling of the Secretary of the Interior. That is the object of my amendment.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the statement of the Senator from Arkansas is a very remarkable one in view of the record. In the first place, the Secretary of the Interior did not make the ruling to which he refers, nor anything that bears the color of such a ruling, until the 3d of January last. No mining has been done in Alaska since that date. The ruling was in the nature of a dictum or suggestion. There was no case for consideration; it was a mere letter. The ruling was manifestly erroneous, if made.

In 1898 we passed an act of Congress entitled "An act extending the homestead laws and providing for right of way for railroads in the district of Alaska, and for other purposes," and the act was approved on the 14th of May, 1898. The tenth section of the act provides for the taking up of pieces of land for purposes of manufacture and productive industry. The purpose of that section was to give the persons engaged in the canning business in Alaska an opportunity to purchase patches of land upon which they could erect their works. It limited the amount of land they could acquire title for to 80 rods along the water front of navigable water. It provided that each alternate 80 rods of shore front should be reserved by the United States from entry and be subject to common use. It provided further that through each one of the tracts for which title should be given under the law a roadway 60 feet in width should be reserved parallel with the coast, not upon the edge of the tide, but parallel with the shore line. It might be 200 feet or a quarter of a mile inland, but the right of way for a road was reserved parallel to the shore line. This 60 feet of land was reserved only as to lands which should be patented under the particular act, and it is not susceptible of any other construction. Permit me to read the language:

> That there shall be reserved by the United States a space of 80 rods in width between tracts sold or entered under the provisions of this act on lands abutting on any navigable stream, inlet, gulf, bay, or seashore.

Then it provides for rules by the Secretary of the Interior, and proceeding says:

> And a roadway 60 feet in width, parallel to the shore line as near as may be practicable, shall be reserved for the use of the public as a highway.

The two portions of this section taken together show that we reserved every alternate 80 rods, and we reserved a roadway 60 feet in width in lands disposed of under that particular act. Now, the Senator from Arkansas contends that we went beyond the lands disposed of under the act and provided that there should be a 60-foot strip reserved along the entire coast of Alaska, extending in the aggregate over probably eight to ten thousand miles of territory. No such thought existed.

Mr. BERRY. If the Senator will permit me——

Mr. CARTER. And the Secretary of the Interior——

Mr. BERRY. I made no such statement.

Mr. CARTER. Well, then, the Senator——

Mr. BERRY. I said that the Secretary of the Interior held that this roadway, whether it be shorter or longer, whatever roadway you refer to in your amendment, was not subject to the location of mining claims, and having so held, my amendment simply provides that in opening it we shall have relation to future transactions and not to the past. I want to avoid, if the Senator will permit me, the confirming of the title of this company that went there when the whole world did not have the right to go.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the Senator from Arkansas must then admit that if the Secretary construed the law, as he contends he construed it, erroneously, and if anybody located a claim up there on this 60-foot reserve, he had a perfect right to do so; and the Senator from Arkansas, upon his own construction, desires to deprive him of that right.

Now, the Secretary of the Interior has made no such decision as the Senator refers to. On the 5th of February the Secretary wrote the following letter to the Commissioner of the General Land Office:

> FEBRUARY 5, 1900.
> SIR: Referring to departmental letter of the 3d ultimo relating to the application of the mining laws of the United States to mineral lands in Alaska lying above and below the line of ordinary high tide, I now recall that paragraph of said letter relating to lands lying upon the beach above the line of ordinary high tide, and hereby substitute instead the following:
>
> As to that part of Mr. Logan's communication which relates to lands lying on the beach above the line of ordinary high tide there would be no doubt that such lands are public lands of the United States, and if mineral in character can be located, occupied, and held under the mining laws as extended to Alaska, the same as any other public mineral lands in said district, if it were not for the provision in section 10 of the act of May 14, 1898 (30 Stat., 409, 413)—

Which I have read—

> which declares that a "roadway 60 feet in width parallel to the shore line as near as may be practicable shall be reserved for the use of the public as a highway." The effect of this provision has not yet been sufficiently considered by the Department to justify the expression of any opinion thereon at this time.
>
> You will notify Mr. Logan hereof.
> Very respectfully,
>
> E. A. HITCHCOCK,
> Secretary.
> THE COMMISSIONER OF THE GENERAL LAND OFFICE.

Mr. President, the amendment which has been presented as part of the amendment accepted by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] was presented because some one questioned the proper construction of the act of 1898. It never was intended that a roadway should extend over mineral lands. There is no reason for the rule. The lands to be conveyed under section 10 of the act of 1898 were intended to be conveyed to canning establishments. Those canning establishments would construct buildings upon the land and inclose them with fences; and to the end that we might prevent such fences and structures from preventing free access to and from one point to another on the shore, we provided that this open roadway should be retained parallel with the shore.

No such reason exists with reference to mining claims. Those claims are never inclosed. Inclosure is contrary to and in conflict with the general purpose for which mining claims are taken up. They sluice off the entire surface of those mining claims, wash the gravel and driveway into the sea, or the shore, or wheresoever they can lodge it. There is no pasture land; no desire to put up structures for habitations, or for any other purpose. Therefore, the whole country is an open roadway.

Now, to say that this road must be continued indefinitely around the coast of Alaska is to contend for a construction that seems to me utterly absurd and wholly at variance with the language and intent of the act which we undertake to construe in the light of the question that has been raised. In so far as the alleged company is concerned, it is said that somebody at some time last year or the year before, having this law in mind, perhaps giving a rational interpretation to it, located a mining claim which did not stop 60 feet above the shore line, but went down to the high-tide line; some one else located an adjoining claim, and thus they continued possibly 200 miles along that coast.

Now, the Senator from Arkansas by his amendment proposes to cut off the end line of each of those claims and move them back 60 feet, so that A, B, C, D, E, F, or anybody else can go in there next year and locate that 60-foot strip, taking it off the other lands claimed. I do not think the amendment ought to be entertained.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, I think it a little unfortunate that the Secretary of the Interior should have made a ruling which the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] says is without foundation in law; that it is absolutely absurd and can not be sustained by any argument. If the Senator is correct, I think it unfortunate that we did not have a Secretary of the Interior who knew a little more about the law when he made that first ruling. I think it unfortunate that he must come in now and modify and change and take back that ruling, and say that he will hold the question open.

The Senator says that my amendment proposes to continue this roadway. The Senator well knows that my amendment does not propose to continue the roadway. There is not one word in it about continuing the roadway. His amendment says that the roadway shall be opened up to location. If it is already open, what is the necessity of the Senator offering the amendment that he proposes to open it? I say by my amendment that when you do open it you must not confirm a title located contrary to the ruling of the Secretary of the Interior as to what the law was. It is not seeking to cut a man out of his rights; it is to prevent the Congress of the United States giving these parties, this company, an advantage over others who have equal rights and who were cut out by the law. Now, for us to come in and legislate to confirm a title to parties who located contrary to law is manifestly unjust. The only thing in my amendment is that it provides that this legislation authorizing the location of claims shall apply to future claims and shall not ratify a location heretofore made.

I think when we open up this location every man ought to have an equal right, and this company should not have its title confirmed to the exclusion of other people who have equal rights. That is all there is in the amendment.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. BERRY. Certainly.

Mr. SCOTT. Do I understand that the Senator's amendment would not interfere with locations already made?

Mr. BERRY. I understand that the object of the amendment is to prevent the confirmation of locations already made. My amendment was intended to confine its operation to the future. That is the purpose of the amendment. I do not want the parties who made locations contrary to all law to have their titles confirmed by this legislation; and therefore my amendment says that in locating these claims on that roadway this law shall apply to the locations to be made. That is what it does; that is, when the law passes that every man shall have an equal show, and that those men who are there now contrary to law shall not have an advantage over others.

Mr. STEWART. Suppose that the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] is right in his construction—and I am very confident he is—that this law did not apply to mineral lands and never was intended to apply to them. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY] always means to be a fair man.

Mr. BERRY. I try to be.

Mr. STEWART. I am very confident—and I have looked over the law—that it does not apply and was not intended to apply except to those pieces of ground granted for fishing and such purposes.

Here is land that was open to exploration and to location. Suppose people located it as mining ground innocently. I should have located it in that way if I had been there, and I was astonished when I heard a question had been raised in the Department that this applied to mineral lands. I have no doubt that all this ground, where it is in the mining region, has already been located, and located under the mining law as other mining ground. I do not think you will find a foot of vacant ground. The mining laws limit them to a certain amount; and if they have done that, would it be fair to say that their titles should not be good? If persons who located now could have a good title, I would not disturb the titles that exist.

Mr. BERRY. I say, if it was contrary to the law of location, and the Secretary of the Interior has ruled that it was, then it is unfair that a man who violates the law, or, as the Secretary has said, was violating the law—if you want to put it in that way—should be allowed to go in there and take advantage over other people, and then for Congress to confirm his location, that is not fair.

Mr. STEWART. But suppose he was there and made the location in good faith, and the Secretary made a mistake in what he said—I think he did—nobody up there knows anything about it, and this occurred down here—would it be fair to invalidate his title?

Mr. BERRY. I am not invalidating his title. I propose to let him law that out with the courts and the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. STEWART. He would have no chance.

Mr. BERRY. But I do not desire to validate the title where there is a dispute as to whether it is legal or not.

If the Senator desires me to answer, I will say that what I object to is a ruling of the Secretary of the Interior by which one particular company can go there and make locations and the ordinary miner is kept away by reason of the law, and then we step in and confirm the title to that individual or to that company, to the exclusion of everybody else. I want them all to have a fair chance when this law passes, and to take equal chances under it.

Mr. STEWART. The difficulty will be when this law passes that those who have the information are here, and they will get up into that country as quickly as they can and take the ground before the others who are up there find out about it. The difficulty will be that a man who has been there for two years working this ground will find another man owning the ground if you invalidate his title. They all knew what the law was when they went there.

Mr. BERRY. The Senator can rest easy on that point. I assure him that the company has lawyers employed in this city now looking after the confirmation of their title, and they will be advised.

Mr. STEWART. I never heard of it.

Mr. BERRY. What I object to is giving them an advantage. I hope when the law passes for the opening of that roadway that all the world will have an equal chance. I do not seek to invalidate any valid title, but I seek to prevent the confirmation of a title which the Secretary of the Interior says is invalid.

Mr. STEWART. The Senator refers to a company. I have not heard of any company locating there. I have not heard anything about that.

Mr. BERRY. I was so told by a member of the House of Representatives.

Mr. CARTER. The Senator from Arkansas is the only one who knows anything about such a company.

Mr. BERRY. I will state to the Senator from Montana, since he makes this personal to me and wants to know what I have heard, I can tell him the whole story; but probably I had best not.

Mr. CARTER. I would tell the whole story.

Mr. BERRY. A member of the other House, the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, has already secured the passage of a bill through the House of Representatives providing for the opening of this roadway, which he says does not confirm any past location. I have had information from other members of the House of Representatives that there was a company; and I say that the attorneys appeared here; and there are attorneys who object, they say, to interfering with the title that they claim they have already secured. That is what I have heard; and when the Senator says that I am the only man who has heard that there has been any such location, he is misinformed. There are others who have heard it.

Of course if the Senate of the United States want to confirm this title, they have the power to do it; but it seems to me it would be better to adopt my amendment and let these parties take their chance before the Interior Department and before the courts. If it shall be decided that they are entitled to the property, then they can not be kept out of it; but when you legislate to confirm their title, you give them an advantage over other men, who are kept out by reason of the fact that the Secretary of the Interior has held that they were not entitled to go there. I do not wish to confirm any title, but I wish to leave it to the courts to determine.

Mr. CARTER. The Senator from Arkansas must admit that the letter of the Secretary of the Interior in the Logan case was written after all of the people had concluded mining in the year 1899. The letter was written on the 3d of January, 1900. What mining location has been made in Alaska of which the Senator has knowledge, or the gentleman to whom he refers, since the 3d day of last January? Not a human being could get out from Cape Nome since January that I know of. It was certainly impossible under all the depths of snow that rest along that shore to have made any mining location since January.

Now, the Senator thinks it is outrageous when the Secretary of the Interior had advised these people of the law that they should go on and make locations. It can not be possible that any locations have been made since the Secretary's letter was written.

The necessary effect of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas is to disturb every title along the shore line of Bering Sea; not alone at Cape Nome, but along the whole shore line of Bering Sea throughout its length, by saying that hereafter the law of 1898, which by no distortion can be made to apply, shall not be hereafter applied. The sum and substance of it, the necessary inference will be, that every man who went there and in good faith made a location up to this date or prior to the date of the letter of January 3 shall be deprived of title and driven out. I do not think that is fair. I do not think it is just. I should like to see, in so far as litigants are concerned, people left in statu quo. It is not the part of Congress to place a retroactive construction on any law.

Mr. BERRY. That is precisely what the Senator from Montana is seeking to do by his amendment—to confirm these titles—and that is the thing to which I object. The confirmation of an illegal location made there, if it turns out to be illegal, thereby gives that party an advantage. I am not seeking to disturb title; I am saying by my amendment that this law opening that strip shall apply to future transactions, not to past transactions.

Mr. CARTER. But, Mr. President, the law has continuously applied to lands that were taken up under the act, and to none others. Now, the Senator from Arkansas by his amendment would have an inference created that the act of 1898 was susceptible to a construction which does not apply, and I do not believe the Senator would say on his own responsibility that it does apply.

Mr. BERRY. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. BERRY. When the Senator by his amendment says that this shall be open to the location of mineral claims, is there not an inference there that that was the law? Otherwise, why put it in the bill at all?

Mr. CARTER. The Senator is right, except that he does not state what is correct.

Mr. BERRY. In what way did I state what was incorrect?

Mr. CARTER. There is nothing in the amendment saying a word about a location. It is merely provided that the act of 1898 shall not be construed as applying to mineral lands or town sites.

Mr. BERRY. Precisely, and is not that an inference that it does apply? Otherwise why legislate about it? Does not the inference follow that, if the Senator did not think it did apply, it would be unnecessary for him to legislate and say that it shall not apply? Why, then, does he speak of inferences, when he is seeking by an amendment of his own to open up that strip, and thereby he admits without legislation that it is not open?

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, what the Secretary of the Interior in a formal letter declares to have been an inconsiderate expression raised the question of this law applying to mineral lands, thus making of that a debatable question.

The Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] presented an amendment providing that this act should not apply to mineral lands or town sites. I do not know whence the Senator procured the draft of that amendment, but I do know that some days ago the Attorney-General for the Interior Department, claiming that this question was somewhat ambiguous, presented to me to be adopted here an amendment almost identical with the amendment to-day presented by the Senator from Nevada—an amendment written by the Assistant Attorney-General to cure what he thought was a defect in the law, in that it did not make clear the point at which this road was to terminate. The amendment is in these words:

Provided, That the 60-foot roadway provided for in section 10 of the act of May 14, 1898, shall not apply to mineral lands or to lands entered under the town-site law.

That comes from the Department. They did not see any reason for the application of this 60-foot roadway, but they think that possibly the law ought to be thus construed, and the reason the Secretary assigns is, as I understand it, that they did not provide that the 60-foot roadway should extend all around the coast, but it will stop short when it comes to the mineral lands, and therefore it ought to be extended to the mineral lands, running indefinitely after the reason for its existence has ceased to be.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY] to the amendment of the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER]. [Putting the question.] By the sound the "noes" have it.

Mr. BERRY. I ask for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the amendment to the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CULBERSON (when Mr. CHILTON's name was called). My colleague [Mr. CHILTON] is necessarily absent. He is paired on this question with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS].

Mr. HEITFELD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. PLATT], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. MCMILLAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LINDSAY].

Mr. STEWART. I suggest to the Senator from Michigan that he transfer his pair to my colleague [Mr. JONES of Nevada], who is absent.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LINDSAY] to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES] and vote "nay."

Mr. PETTUS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. RAWLINS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HANNA].

Mr. TURLEY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER]. I do not know how he would vote if present; but if I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. WELLINGTON (when has name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER]. As he is not present, I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BURROWS. I am paired with the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. CAFFERY], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. WELLINGTON. I understand that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. TURLEY] who is paired with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] is willing that he and I may transfer pairs, I being paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER], which will enable us both to vote.

Mr. TURLEY. That is satisfactory to me.

Mr. WELLINGTON. I vote "nay."

Mr. TURLEY. Under that arrangement I am at liberty to vote, and I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 17, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—17.

Bacon,	Cockrell,	Nelson,	Turley,
Bard,	Culberson,	Quarles,	Vest.
Bate,	Daniel,	Taliaferro,
Berry,	Harris,	Teller,
Clay,	Jones, Ark.	Tillman,

NAYS—27.

Carter,	Frye,	McMillan,	Simon,
Clark, Wyo.	Gallinger,	Perkins,	Stewart,
Cullom,	Hansbrough,	Platt, Conn.	Thurston,
Davis,	Hawley,	Ross,	Warren,
Deboe,	Kean,	Scott,	Wellington,
Fairbanks,	Lodge,	Sewell,	Wetmore.
Foraker,	McCumber,	Shoup,

NOT VOTING—43.

Aldrich,	Depew,	Lindsay,	Pettigrew,
Allen,	Elkins,	McBride,	Pettus,
Allison,	Foster,	McComas,	Platt, N. Y.
Baker,	Gear,	McEnery,	Pritchard,
Beveridge,	Hale,	McLaurin,	Proctor,
Burrows,	Hanna,	Mallory,	Rawlins,
Butler,	Heitfeld,	Martin,	Spooner,
Caffery,	Hoar,	Mason,	Sullivan,
Chandler,	Jones, Nev.	Money,	Turner,
Chilton,	Kenney,	Morgan,	Wolcott.
Clark, Mont.	Kyle,	Penrose,

So the amendment of Mr. BERRY to the amendment of Mr. CARTER was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana.

Mr. PETTUS. I desire to have the amendment divided. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the words added by the Senator from Nevada. Will the President pro tempore kindly allow me to look at the amendment? It has not been printed at all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama demands a division of the amendment. In the opinion of the Chair it is capable of division.

Mr. PETTUS. I move to amend by striking out the words that are written on the side of the amendment, the words proposed by the Senator from Nevada and accepted, as I understood, by the Senator in charge of the bill. I want it distinctly voted on whether the Secretary of the Interior here in Washington is to be allowed to enact laws for the Pacific coast in reference to these miners. I do not think it ought to be done, and I want the Senate to say whether or not it shall be done separately from all other questions.

While I am on my feet I wish, in obedience to a promise I made to the Senator from Connecticut, to ask the Senator from Montana a question.

Mr. CARTER. I will be glad to respond if I can.

Mr. PETTUS. I would be very happy, and so would the Senator from Connecticut, if the Senator from Montana would inform us what he means by shoal water, when he gets outside of the land, and how far shoal water will go.

Mr. CARTER. I will utilize the Standard Dictionary of the English language as a part of my answer.

Mr. PETTUS. I want the Senator to answer. I do not want any of his dictionary definitions. That is a mere subterfuge. I do not want it, and the Senator ought not to practice such things on the Senate. What does he mean by it?

Mr. CARTER. I accept the compliment as well bestowed. I think the authority is quite as good as the dictionary. Shoal water is regarded as the water between the blue line and the shore on the edge of navigable water of the sea, and is defined by the dictionaries and is well understood in the nautical parlance of the age to be inside of the blue line of the sea. In the present case we have another qualification, the Senator will observe, which may be calculated to limit the extension of this shoal water; that is, the water within the jurisdiction of the United States. That jurisdiction does not extend beyond the 3-mile limit, I believe. If the Senator will indulge me for a moment, I will read from the dictionary, which I recognize as supplemental authority and of some little weight. It is defined:

To grow shallow; as, the change from blue to green shows that the water shoals.

Then it is also used in reference to shoals—

To throng in schools or shoals; assemble in multitudes.

Further—

Of little depth; shallow; as, shoal water.
The anchorage is shoal but safe, and easy of access.
A shallow place in any body of water; a shallow. A sand bank or bar, especially one seen at low water; as, stranded on a shoal, etc.

Mr. PETTUS. I suppose, then, the Senator would have the shoal water extend out 10 or 15 miles if it were actually shoal water out that far?

Mr. CARTER. I think the other clause in the amendment would limit the extension to our jurisdiction, which is 3 miles.

Mr. TELLER. Would there be any objection to extending it 15 miles if we could get gold?

Mr. CARTER. I think not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama moves to strike out certain words, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "shall," in line 13 of the amendment, it is proposed to strike out "be subject to such general rules as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe for mining below high tides, and shall."

Mr. STEWART. When the junior Senator from Colorado had a similar provision in his amendment, it applied generally to the mines, and I opposed it. I do not want the Secretary of the Interior or any other tribunal authorized to change the general mining laws which have been established always since the people have inhabited the country. But on conversation with him I saw his purpose was to provide regulations for the lands that are below high-water mark, and I suggested this amendment to the Senator having charge of the bill. I think it would be very well. I am not tenacious about it. I do not think any harm would come, and I think good might come, from allowing the Secretary to make general rules and regulations applying to the mines in this anomalous condition. They may extend out to the 3-mile limit under water. It would be inconvenient to stake them, etc. There ought to be some power which should make general rules for marking the claims, stating how it should be done. It is not done in detail.

I think something of the kind is necessary in addition to such rules as the miners may make. They may supply the whole of it; but inasmuch as it goes out beyond what has been their jurisdiction, into the water, I thought it would be very well to allow a Government officer to make general rules as to that. I am not tenacious about it; and if it is voted down, I shall not feel myself rebuked, because it is somewhat doubtful with me whether it ought to be done. But still my belief is that it would be better to let some Government officer have general supervision of this anomalous condition, not in conflict with miners' laws and not in conflict with the existing law. It is not to give an undue area; he can not do that; but he might make some regulations as to how they should proceed, for they can not go upon the ground and mark it as they are required to do under the mining laws. I am quite indifferent as to this. Let the mining men work it out if you have that much confidence in them. They have done a great many extraordinary and difficult things. If the words are stricken out, I shall not object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PETTUS] to strike out the words which have been read.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. CARTER. I now request that at 4 o'clock on Thursday next a vote be taken on the bill and all amendments then pending. I suggested that that agreement be entered earlier in the day, but the Senator from Nevada——

Mr. STEWART. I can not make any agreement until the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH] has been disposed of, because otherwise I may not be in such a position to debate it. I want that amendment disposed of, because it will lead to a good deal of discussion, and other matters may come up and there may not be a clear opportunity for discussion if an agreement is now made. So I can not make any agreement until that is disposed of. I think when that is voted on it will dispose of the bill pretty much.

Mr. CARTER. Would it not suit the Senator's convenience to vote on Saturday?

Mr. STEWART. I will not make any agreement until the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota is disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. WARREN. I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend section 4 by striking out, in lines 7 and 8, on page 4, after the word "President," the words:

And no person over the age of 50 years shall be eligible to appointment as a judge of the district court.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. I have another amendment which I wish to offer. I observe that there is in the bill no provision for anyone to act as chief executive officer in the absence of the governor. The executive officer is necessarily absent at times in a Commonwealth or Territory, and hence I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out section 3 and substitute in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 3. That there shall be appointed for the district a secretary, who shall reside therein during his term of office, whose duty it shall be, under the direction of the governor, to record and preserve all the papers and proceedings of the executive, and transmit one copy of the executive proceedings and correspondence semiannually, on the 1st days of January and July in each year, to the President of the United States. And in case of the death, removal, resignation, or absence of the governor from the district the secretary shall be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to execute and perform all the powers and duties of the governor during such vacancy or absence, or until another governor shall be duly appointed and qualified to fill such vacancy.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. WARREN. In that case I offer the amendment I send to the desk, which covers the same point in another way.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add to section 10 the following:

In case of the death, removal, resignation or other necessary absence of the governor from the district, the surveyor-general and ex officio secretary of the district shall have, and he is hereby authorized and required to execute and perform, all the powers and duties of the governor during such vacancy or absence or until another governor shall be appointed to fill such vacancy.

Mr. BATE. Is that transferring the power of the governor to another man? I should like to have it explained.

Mr. WARREN. In the absence of the governor it merely authorizes the secretary to act for him just as is done in every other Territory and as it always has been done.

Mr. CARTER. I am inclined to think the Senator's amendment should be added to section 3 instead of section 10.

Mr. SHOUP. I think the word "qualified" should be added.

Mr. WARREN. What is the Senator's suggestion?

Mr. CARTER. I suggest that the Senator add his amendment to section 3 rather than to section 10.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On page 4.

Mr. WARREN. I do not think it matters where it comes in, except that section 10 is the one which refers to the duties of the surveyor-general.

Mr. CARTER. It is a mere matter of form.

Mr. WARREN. I am not particular where it is placed.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Let the amendment be stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will again be stated.

The Secretary again read the amendment.

Mr. CARTER. There is no objection to the amendment.

Mr. BATE. The word "removal" seems to be very broad, and I do not know whether it is proper or not. If he should be removed or impeached, or anything else should happen, I understand his successor takes his place, as indicated in the amendment. The Senator had better look at the word "removal."

Mr. WARREN. I will do so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wyoming modifies his amendment.

Mr. CARTER. Let the amendment as modified be stated.

The Secretary read as follows:

In case of death, removal, resignation, or other necessary absence of the governor from the district, the surveyor-general, as ex-officio secretary of the district, shall have, and is hereby authorized and required to execute and perform, all the powers and duties of the governor during such vacancy or absence or until another governor shall be appointed to fill such vacancy.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wyoming.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Are there further amendments as in Committee of the Whole? If not, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

Mr. BATE. There are other amendments, but it is very late. I know of three or four. One is on hand now. I refer to the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH].

Mr. STEWART. Let us take that up now.

Mr. BATE. It can be taken up to-morrow or at any other time. Senators will see it is now getting on toward 5 o'clock. It is hardly worth while to take it up now. We spent an hour on it the other day.

Mr. CARTER. The amendment of the Senator from North Dakota will lead to considerable debate, and, in order to facilitate the progress of the bill, I suggest to the Senator from Tennessee that he present his amendments at this time.

Mr. BATE. I have some amendments which I think will lead to perhaps more debate than the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota. That is one reason why I wanted to get his amendment out of the way. Then I will bring mine forward.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there are no further amendments as in Committee of the Whole, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. There are certain amendments to be offered which it will take time to consider. The Senate seems reluctant to proceed with the consideration of those amendments this afternoon, and I move to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, April 17, 1900, at 12 o'clock m.

NOMINATION.

Executive nomination received by the Senate April 16, 1900.

GOVERNOR OF PORTO RICO.

Charles H. Allen, of Massachusetts, to be the governor of Porto Rico, an original appointment, as provided for by an act of Congress entitled "An act temporarily to provide revenues and a civil government for Porto Rico, and for other purposes," approved April 12, 1900.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate April 16, 1900.

CONSUL.

Charles E. Barnes, of Illinois, to be consul of the United States at Cologne, Germany.

PROMOTION IN THE NAVY.

Capt. Silas W. Terry, to be a rear-admiral in the Navy, from the 29th day of March, 1900.

POSTMASTERS.

Frank G. Pennell, to be postmaster at Mount Joy, in the county of Lancaster and State of Pennsylvania.

William Krause, to be postmaster at Richland Center, in the county of Bucks and State of Pennsylvania.

Henry D. Ruth, to be postmaster at Lansdale, in the county of Montgomery and State of Pennsylvania.

Henry F. Hershey, to be postmaster at Steelton, in the county of Dauphin and State of Pennsylvania.

Daniel G. Engle, to be postmaster at Marietta, in the county of Lancaster and State of Pennsylvania.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, April 16, 1900.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday was read and approved.

POSTAL ECONOMIC BILL.

Mr. McPHERSON. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the minority of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, six in number, I desire to file a minority report on House bill 9393, and I ask for a reprint of the majority report with the minority report accompanying it. There was an arrangement by which the two were to be filed together, but through forgetfulness the majority report was on file a day before we knew about it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to file a minority report from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads on the Post-Office appropriation bill, together with the reprint of the majority and minority report.

Mr. McPHERSON. Not the appropriation bill, Mr. Speaker, but what is called the postal economic bill.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman give the number of it?

Mr. McPHERSON. Nine thousand three hundred and ninety-three.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of the naval appropriation bill, and pending that motion, I am instructed by the committee to ask that the general debate be limited to fourteen hours, seven hours upon a side; seven hours to be controlled on that side by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS], or, if he so elects, to be distributed by the minority members of the committee, and the time on this side to be controlled by the acting chairman of the committee. And, furthermore, that upon the expiration of this time, or in case general debate should be exhausted before the expiration of the time agreed upon, it shall then be in order to call for the reading of the bill and debated under the five-minute rule.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the naval appropriation bill; and, pending that, he asks unanimous consent that general debate be continued for fourteen hours, seven hours on a side, and that the gentleman from Illinois, acting chairman of the committee, shall control one half of the time and the gentleman from New York shall control the other half of the time, with the right to yield to other members of the minority; that when general debate expires, or, if it shall be exhausted before the fourteen hours expire, the bill shall then be considered under the five-minute rule.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, I will state that under this arrangement I hope that general debate will be through by to-morrow evening at 5 o'clock, because, although this side will have seven hours, I do not see where the speakers are to come from. I think we shall be able to finish it by that time.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Speaker, I am authorized to say that the proposition is acceptable to the minority, with the understanding that each member of the minority has his hour, and members who desire time, consequently, will get their time from the minority members.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I want to say a word, if I can have the attention of the gentleman from Illinois as well as the gentleman from New York. From glancing at the majority and minority report and the bill itself I can see some very important questions to be determined in Committee of the Whole. Take the coast survey which is proposed by it, for instance, and the question in the minority report of an armor-plate factory, and the question of the utilization of the navy-yards for construction of ships—all very important questions. Now, it seems to me it would be better to have an hour on each side to cover at least these three general questions—an hour on each side of general debate upon the particular measures when they are reached.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. That is what I was going to suggest.

Mr. CANNON. I suggest that we should have an hour on a side, with the assurance that where the debate is in good faith and upon the merits of the proposition it will be a little bit free and easy for time when these measures are reached. I should be glad myself to submit some remarks upon one of these matters, but I should rather not do it to empty benches, and would rather it would be a real debate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say something in the line of what the gentleman from Illinois has just said. The armor-plate question has harassed Congress in this general aspect for four or five years. As the gentleman from Illinois has said, if this question is discussed in general debate, the probabilities are that those who speak on the question will speak to empty benches, because the moment we agree upon fourteen hours of general debate on the bill the members drop out and attend to their business in town. It is a live question, one that ought to be settled now, one that is dealing with the building of the United States Navy. The Naval Committee has never brought a more important question before this House, and it is a matter that ought to be settled and settled right. Therefore, I hope the chairman of the committee will agree now that there shall be a liberal debate.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Along the line suggested by the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from Alabama, I desire to say to the House that the differences in the Naval Committee are merely questions of business judgment; and I think I am warranted in the statement that the discussion on general debate on both sides of the House will be confined entirely, or practically so, to matters of difference between members of the committee. I have no desire myself to give the benefit of what real observation and investigation I have made to empty benches and I sincerely hope that the members of the House will not pay us the compliment, but will feel it incumbent on themselves to listen to this discussion. I am satisfied that no member on the other side desires to bring general politics into this discussion. There are no politics in the Naval Committee; the matters of difference are simply questions of what is best for the American people.

Speaking for myself alone, I have absolutely no pride of opinion in regard to my individual views on this question. If the majority of my colleagues differ with me, I shall acquiesce with great pleasure in their judgment. But this is a matter which concerns the people, and, as suggested by the gentleman from Illinois, there are three matters of difference between us that the House alone can determine; and it would be absolute folly for us to indulge in general debate here for two days unless members of the House propose to remain and listen and take part in the discussion.

Mr. HOPKINS. Then why should not the gentleman in charge of the bill move that the general debate be limited to eight hours and provide that two hours shall be allowed for debate on each proposition suggested by my colleague from Illinois when the bill is before the Committee of the Whole under the five-minute rule?

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, that would be entirely satisfactory to me except for this consideration: I am quite confident that no man can intelligently present under the five-minute rule the objections that we of the minority have to the ideas embodied in this bill, and I should not like to make a speech in sections. I desire to say to the House what I have to say at one time and then quit. I think the other gentlemen of the committee feel the same way; I am quite sure the chairman does. And when the five-minute debate is reached it is my desire that the other members of the House be allowed to present their views fully in this debate. What we of the committee desire to say we want to say now, so that the members of the House may have the benefit of our investigations and of the hearings before the committee. For that reason I sincerely hope that the members of the House will stay here and listen to what we have to say.

Mr. CANNON. I suggest to the gentleman in charge of this bill that when the Coast Survey items are reached he ask unanimous consent that there be general debate of two hours at that time, if desired.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. There is no disagreement in the committee on that question; we are unanimous upon it.

Mr. CANNON. We are not unanimous in the House.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I say the committee are unanimous.

Mr. FOSS. In view of what I have heard here this morning in reference to limiting general debate, I would suggest that a better arrangement might be made in this form: The general debate to continue for to-day, one-half to be controlled by the other side and one-half by this; that then we enter upon the reading and debating of the bill under the five-minute rule, but with the understanding that when we reach these points of disagreement—for instance, the Coast and Geodetic Survey, the question of the manufacture of armor plate, and the question of building ships in the Government navy-yards—we have debate upon those three propositions for two hours each.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSS] modifies his request for unanimous consent so as to ask that general debate close with this day's session, and that to-morrow the House enter upon the consideration of the bill under the five-minute rule, with the understanding that when the questions of armor-plate manufacture, the building of ships in Government navy-yards, and the Coast and Geodetic Survey are reached there be allowed two hours' debate upon each of those three propositions. Is there objection?

Mr. CUMMINGS. I object. The minority of the committee is instructed to stand by the proposition for seven hours, which they desire for general debate. I have no idea but that when we reach the paragraph to which the gentleman has alluded some understanding can be reached by which debate may be confined to two hours or one hour, or some other definite time satisfactory to the House. But I do think we should stand by the original proposition. I know that members of the minority desire to present their views in general debate in such a way as that they may have ample time, and not have their speeches cut into sections as the bill is when we come to consider it by sections.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. Then I will ask the gentleman to further modify his proposition——

The SPEAKER. There is now no proposition before the House—only the motion to go into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CANNON. I suggest that the gentleman ask also that when desired general debate for not exceeding two hours each may be had on the three propositions—the Coast Survey, the armor-plate manufacture, and the building of ships in the navy-yards—the debate to take place as each proposition is reached.

Mr. HEPBURN. Does the gentleman from Illinois suggest three hours' debate on each of those propositions?

Mr. CANNON. Only two hours on each, if that much time be desired.

Mr. HEPBURN. That would be sixteen hours of general debate upon this bill, which would occupy four days.

Mr. CANNON. I propose to have six hours of real debate when the bill is considered.

Mr. HEPBURN. I have no objection to that proposition, if it be coupled by unanimous consent with the further provision that there be no political debate.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I will say that the committee itself requested that no political debate be had and that the debate should be confined to the consideration of the bill as far as practicable——

Mr. CUMMINGS. The committee is unanimous in that.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky (continuing). Except, of course, so far as we can not prevent.

Mr. CUMMINGS. And no objection is made to the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois except to the second one, which limits the general debate to this day.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state that I submitted the original proposition under the instructions of the Committee on Naval Affairs. The last proposition was simply a suggestion of my own and from hearing the remarks of gentlemen on the other side of the House. I understand, however, that objection is made to that. I will renew, therefore, the first proposition.

The SPEAKER. The request from the gentleman from Illinois is that two days be devoted to the general debate upon the pending bill——

Mr. CUMMINGS. Fourteen hours.

The SPEAKER (continuing). One-half to be controlled by himself and one-half by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS], making, as the Chair understands, fourteen hours altogether.

Mr. CANNON. Well, Mr. Speaker, I suggest, if there is no leeway for the general debate, that the gentleman go on with the consideration of the bill in Committee of the Whole, and he can tell better at the close of the day's session how much more time will be required. Of course he has it in his power, having the majority, to close debate at any time he desires.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects, and the question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSS], that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. KITCHIN. I would like to ask a question for information. I want to know whether——

The SPEAKER. Objection has been made to all propositions for unanimous consent, and there is pending now before the House only the motion of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. KITCHIN. I ask if the particular proposition was made which was practically agreed to in committee?

The SPEAKER. It was made, and objected to.

The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the naval appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. PAYNE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10450) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1901, and for other purposes.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to state in the beginning of my remarks that I have prepared a careful report on every provision mentioned in this bill, explaining all of the increases in the appropriations and all of the new items embodied in the bill, which I would ask the members of this committee to carefully read.

In presenting this bill to you I realize that I am doing the duty of him whom, unfortunately, illness has now for many weeks prevented from occupying his accustomed place on this floor. No man in Congress to-day has a wider knowledge of the subject of naval affairs than CHARLES ADDISON BOUTELLE. [Applause.] Born with the true naval spirit, his father a shipmaster and himself when but a lad before the mast, he early became conversant with naval affairs and familiar with the seas. Returning from a foreign voyage in the spring of 1862, he volunteered, and was appointed acting master in the United States Navy. He served in the North and South Atlantic and the West Gulf squadrons, took part in the blockade of Charleston and Wilmington, and was conspicuous in other naval engagements.

While an officer on the U. S. S. Sassacus he won promotion for gallant conduct in an engagement with the rebel ironclad Albermarle, and later took part in the capture of Mobile and the surrender of the Confederate fleet. No man fought with greater bravery than he in the memorable conflict from 1861 to 1865; and when he entered Congress, just at that time when this country was beginning to build up its new Navy, it was but natural that he should be assigned to the important Committee on Naval Affairs.

No man in all the years from that time to this has been more active or devoted to the task of building up a navy that would inspire confidence at home and respect abroad than Mr. BOUTELLE. [Applause.] He was chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs in the Fifty-first, Fifty-fourth, Fifty-fifth, and this Congress, and as such demonstrated his great ability and wise statesmanship in bringing the Navy to that point where it was able successfully to combat the forces of Spain in our recent war. Too much honor and credit can not be given to him. I know that I voice the unanimous expression upon both sides of this Hall when I say that we wish him a speedy recovery and an early return. [Applause.]

Bereft of his counsel and advice, never did men respond better to the responsibilities suddenly thrust upon them than the members of the Naval Committee, with whom I have the honor to be associated, and to-day, as their representative, I present to you this naval appropriation bill, providing for the maintenance of the naval establishment for the coming fiscal year, the largest naval appropriation bill ever presented to an American Congress since the days of old Jack Barry, who, justly or unjustly I have not now time to discuss, has been called the father of the American Navy. We present it to you as the result of our best work, our best judgment, our best conclusions upon the various questions raised in the bill, and we welcome your most thorough consideration and your most searching scrutiny.

This bill carries a total appropriation of $61,200,000. The naval appropriation act of last year carried $48,100,000. This present bill is an increase over the naval appropriation act of last year of $13,109,000. Our appropriations, all told, from all acts last year for the naval service, amounted to $53,400,000. It will be seen that this bill, therefore, carries an increase over all acts appropriating money for the naval service this year of nearly $8,000,000.

The estimates called for by the Department amounted to $70,000,000. This bill shows a reduction from those estimates of more than $8,000,000; so that, from whichever standpoint you view it, this bill is unique in this respect, that in it there is comfort for the economist and satisfaction for the enthusiast.

This increase of a little over $13,100,000 above that appropriated in the last naval appropriation act is attributable to the necessary increase under the headings of "Public works," "Construction and repair," "Steam engineering," and "Increase of the Navy."

Under the head of "Public works" there is an increase over the appropriation of last year of approximately $2,330,000. The estimates of this Department were nearly $14,000,000; and your committee, after carefully scanning these items, came to the conclusion that while public works needed some substantial improvements in order to economically preserve and maintain our naval establishment, yet the amount called for was larger than that which could be judiciously expended during the coming year, and consequently they reduced this appropriation, and recommended, in all, about $8,000,000.

The increase of $3,000,000 under construction and repair is due to the fact that we have more vessels to repair. There are 42 now assigned to the different navy-yards awaiting repair, and it must necessarily follow that as we are building more ships we will have more ships to repair, and consequently there must be an increase in this appropriation year by year. There is an increase in the Bureau of Steam Engineering of $1,500,000 for practically the same reason.

Then, under the head of increase in the Navy the item of construction and machinery, which is an appropriation for vessels which we are now building; and I may say that there are already authorized, and most of them under construction, about sixty vessels; and the increase in this appropriation this year over that of last year is $6,600,000.

So that, taking all these items into consideration, we make up the total increase of this bill over the last naval appropriation act of over $13,000,000, and every dollar of this increase can be traced, either directly or indirectly, to the one fact that we are building up the American Navy.

Now, while this sum seems to be a large one, $61,200,000, yet I may say that, from editorial comments which I have received from different newspapers all over the country, from the most conservative newspapers in the land, as well as those which are the most enthusiastic for the Navy, such as, for instance, the New York Journal, which says that this appropriation is only half big enough, on all sides there has been favorable criticism, so far as the amount of appropriations involved in this bill is concerned.

While it is true that it carries an increase of $13,000,000 over the corresponding bill of last year, and while, as the minority have stated in their views, it is perhaps double what the naval establishment cost three or four years ago, yet it might also be said that it is a great deal more than that which was appropriated twenty-five and fifty years ago.

In fact, one hundred years ago the naval appropriation bill amounted to only about $3,500,000. But the country has grown since then, and some of its most magnificent strides have been made during the last three or four years; and I believe that the people to-day are in favor of a strong and efficient navy; and not only are the people in favor of it, but they are willing to pay for it.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me, if it is apt at this time, touching the increase of the Navy? I see provision is made on pages 62 and 63 of the naval bill for three battle ships.

Mr. DAYTON. Two battle ships.

Mr. CANNON. Two battle ships, 3 cruisers, 3 cruisers of a smaller size, which, I apprehend, while the armament is not spoken of, would cost in the aggregate from forty to forty-five million dollars—I am not strictly accurate, but in that neighborhood. I believe there is not any appropriation for this work.

Mr. FOSS. There is nothing appropriated for it; we simply authorized it.

Mr. CANNON. And authorized contracts?

Mr. FOSS. Yes; to have them built by private contract, but it takes about a year to get the plans out, and it is not presumed that the contracts will be let under a year, probably.

Mr. CANNON. Now, I notice here, in the gentleman's report, that under the head of "New Navy," I believe it is—I had it a moment ago; I will find it.

Mr. FOSS. Page 20?

Mr. CANNON. Is that the new Navy?

Mr. FOSS. "The cost of our new Navy."

Mr. CANNON. Under the head of "The cost of our new Navy," in the gentleman's report, I find the—

Actual cost of finished vessels	$98,529,511.85
Estimated final cost of vessels now under construction	62,570,610.23

substantially yet remains to be appropriated, and all of it, or most of it, appropriated by bills to follow hereafter and not included in the present bill.

Mr. FOSS. There is an appropriation in this bill of nearly $13,000,000 for that object.

Mr. CANNON. For that object, which will leave, in round numbers, for these new vessels of the Navy now authorized by contract prior to this Congress, after the thirteen millions is appropriated in this, in round numbers, $49,000,000, but yet to be provided for by bills following after this session; and then there is the authorization of the additional ships, and against the time they are armed and ready for service, as authorized in this bill, will amount to about how much—fifty millions or more?

Mr. FOSS. Those authorized in this bill, in round numbers, nearly forty millions

Mr. CANNON. Would that include armor and everything?

Mr. FOSS. The maximum cost of these hulls is put down here at $28,350,000, exclusive of armor and armament.

Mr. CANNON. Then if this bill passes as it now is, carrying the appropriation that it now does toward the construction of new ships not heretofore ordered, there will be, to complete these new ships, to complete the authorization in this bill, in round numbers, something over $90,000,000 to be appropriated finally. About forty-nine millions of that has been authorized, and about forty millions is to follow.

Mr. FOSS. I would state that under the head of "Increase of the Navy" in this bill——

Mr. CANNON. Nothing, I will say, is appropriated in this bill for the ships you propose to authorize.

Mr. FOSS. That is true; but under the head of "Increase of the Navy," on page 16, you will find that this bill carries for construction and machinery $12,740,000.

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. FOSS. We also recommend $4,000,000 for armor and armament and $250,000 for equipment, making a total of $16,990,000. So that the figure which I mentioned a few moments ago applies purely to construction and machinery for the increase of the Navy, whereas these other figures which appropriate for armament and armor and equipment ought to be included, making $17,000,000, the appropriation in this bill toward finishing these vessels which already have been authorized and which are now in process of construction.

Mr. CANNON. Now, then, you report $62,000,000 to finish these vessels, to finish them entirely, and that would leave in round numbers $44,000,000 to complete the vessels already authorized, and then to that would have to be added, if this bill passes authorizing the additional ships that the bill provides for, in round numbers, $40,000,000 more, making about $84,000,000 to complete the Navy that has been previously authorized and will be authorized by this bill, but not heretofore appropriated.

Mr. FOSS. I would say, practically, yes, taking into consideration the vessels which we authorize in this act, that it will require in the neighborhood of $80,000,000.

Mr. CUMMINGS. That is altogether.

Mr. CANNON. That is altogether, to finish the vessels that have been authorized and which you are authorized to contract for and not carried in this bill—that is $80,000,000 to be appropriated hereafter.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. That would cover a period of some seven or eight years.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. It is an injustice to allow that statement to go against this bill——

Mr. CANNON. I am not making any objection to the bill.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky (continuing). If you mean to give the committee the impression that there is an increase of eighty millions in this bill.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no; I am not criticising the bill at all or speaking against its policy, but I was trying to see what is to be the appropriation hereafter by virtue of the authorization heretofore made and the authorization in this bill.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Did I understand the gentleman from Illinois to say that the authorization in this bill would entail an expense of forty millions?

Mr. CANNON. That is what my colleague informs me.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I do not think that two battle ships and six cruisers will cost $40,000,000.

Mr. DAYTON. I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois to the fact that if that is true, the total cost of the Navy of the United States, the bulwark of American defense, will only be about forty millions more than the appropriation every year in the annual pension bill.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman must not misstate me, and I know my colleague, the gentleman occupying the floor, does not misunderstand me. I am in no sense criticising the bill, but I am trying in good faith to ascertain, as far as I can, what is the amount entailed in expense upon the money in the Treasury to be hereafter appropriated, by virtue of this and other legislation, for a new Navy.

Mr. CUMMINGS. A very laudable ambition. [Laughter.]

Mr. FOSS. I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois that I have not the accurate figures here, but that this bill, in authorizing new ships, fixes upon a maximum limit for the cost of construction, and in the figures, which I have presented in this bill for the hull of these vessels, cost, in round numbers, $28,500,000. I am simply taking the maximum limit, the cost of the different vessels authorized. The actual cost will be much lower than that—take, for instance, the hull of the Indiana, which costs $3,000,000; the hull of the Kearsarge, cost $2,250,000—and so, while we authorize the maximum limit, it does not mean that the limit is the actual cost of the construction of the hull.

Mr. RIDGELY. In this bill have you made any provision for the Government to manufacture armor plate of its own?

Mr. FOSS. I will reach that provision a little later. I will state to the gentleman, however, that we have made no such provision.

Mr. RIDGELY. Do you not think it is time that we should?

Mr. FOSS. I should be pleased to discuss that question a little later on in the debate.

Mr. RIDGELY. I think it is time that we should manufacture our own plate.

Mr. KITCHIN. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois, the acting chairman of the committee, a question. The limit of construction in the bill does not include the furniture and a great many other things that will probably enhance the cost. For instance, it does not include the machinery.

Mr. FOSS. We appropriate every year anywhere from $250,000 to $400,000 for equipment, and out of that appropriation, I understand, comes the equipment for these vessels—that is, the furniture, and such things as may be necessary in order to put them in condition to live in. Does that answer the gentleman's question?

Mr. KITCHIN. Partially. The point I am getting at is that twenty-eight millions, which is estimated to be the cost of the hulls, does not include the total cost to put them in condition for sea.

Mr. FOSS. No; it does not.

Mr. BROMWELL. On page 16 of the bill is a provision for ocean and lake surveys. I should like to ask the gentleman whether anything in that section is new legislation or whether it follows strictly the provisions in previous bills?

Mr. FOSS. I would state that this is new language, but not new law.

Mr. BROMWELL. Is there not any new law in it at all?

Mr. DAYTON. Not the slightest.

Mr. FOSS. That language, so we were informed by the head of the Bureau, is purely explanatory of what the Navy has been doing all these years.

Mr. BROMWELL. How is it as to the law?

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. It was only for the purpose of more correctly auditing the account.

Mr. BROMWELL. Has the lake survey been in charge of the Navy heretofore?

Mr. FOSS. Always.

Mr. BROMWELL. And the sounding of channels?

Mr. FOSS. Yes; and the ocean survey.

Mr. BROMWELL. But I am speaking more particularly of the lake survey.

Mr. DAYTON. By law there is an office established for doing the work by the Navy Department.

Mr. FOSS. Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the committee to a few points in connection with this bill. In the first place, there is a provision here for the abolition of the two years' sea course at the Naval Academy. It is necessary that we should have more officers, and in order to get more officers it is necessary to abolish a part of the course—what is known as the sea course—which will give the naval cadets a four years' course, the same as the war college has at West Point.

Now, this provision of two years' sea course was tacked on the four years' regular course at the Naval Academy at a time when our Navy was going into decay—away back in 1870, when we did not need any officers. The time has now come when we need some officers, and the sensible thing, in our judgment, is to abolish the two years' sea course, which will give us an additional number of officers. It will bring in, for instance, I think, about 90 or 100 cadets who are now off on their sea courses, and at the same time will allow each member of Congress to appoint a cadet every four years (the same as he does to the war college) instead of every six years, as now.

There is another provision in this bill to which I desire to call the attention of the committee, and that is the question of armor and armament. While I shall go into a more thorough discussion of this question when we reach that particular provision in the bill which applies to it, yet I want now to make a general statement upon this subject. The committee recommends that the Secretary of the Navy be authorized to contract for armor for the three ships, the Maine, the Missouri, and the Ohio, at a cost not to exceed $545 per ton.

Admiral O'Neil, in a statement which was submitted to the committee, said that this armor was needed now—this year. The ships are already in process of construction, and they will be ready to be supplied with armor before the year is over. And he said that in no case should a Government factory be regarded as a possible source of supply of armor for the Maine, the Ohio, and the Missouri. On page 5 of the hearings before the committee Admiral O'Neil makes this statement:

> I am of the opinion that the rational and most economical course to be followed with regard to procuring armor for three battle ships of the Maine class now under construction, and for which the aggregate of about 7,360 tons is required, is to purchase the same by contract at a price not to exceed that asked by the American armor manufacturers—namely, $545 per ton; such armor to be made by the Krupp process, or to be of a quality equal thereto in ballistic and other properties.

Further, he states:

> It is absolutely necessary that the armor for the three battle ships of the Maine class should be contracted for at an early date, as the contracts for the hulls and machinery of said vessels were executed October, 1898—sixteen months ago. To defer much longer making the armor contracts will undoubtedly delay the completion of these vessels or some of them beyond the contract date of completion, which expires in June, 1901.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Will my colleague permit me a question right there?

Mr. FOSS. Certainly.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Does not the gentleman think it would be just to the committee (if he proposes to enter into the discussion of the armor-plate question), to state that so far as concerns the procurement of armor for the three battle ships now on the stocks, there is absolutely no difference of opinion in the committee: that we are all in favor of buying the armor for those three battle ships? It is the question of future supply on which we disagree. I think that statement would be but just.

Mr. FOSS. I will say to the gentleman that in the statement I have made up to this time I have not criticised at all the views of the minority on this proposition.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I know that; but I think it would be just to make the statement I have indicated.

Mr. FOSS. As the gentleman has stated the matter, I will confirm it—that so far as the provision for armor is concerned for these three vessels which need it now, the Maine, the Missouri, and the Ohio, there is no difference of opinion in the committee. Upon the question of the authorization of an armor-plate factory by the Government, I beg to state that the committee saw fit to leave that matter entirely to the House. In view of the statement——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. FOSS. When I get through with this statement.

The committee did not believe it was wise for them to recommend to this House that the Government should undertake the manufacture of armor. Admiral O'Neil, in his statement, says that the cost of a Government armor plant would be $4,872,285.74. You will find this statement on page 37 of the hearings. He further stated, on page 6 of the hearings:

> I do not think it is expedient for the Government to undertake the manufacture of armor for several reasons, which I will state, though I do not regard it as an impracticable undertaking.

Further, on page 7, he says:

> It is not likely that armor could or would be more cheaply produced by the Government than it could be bought, unless all consideration of interest on the value of the plant and on working capital is discarded.

Now, I simply want to state just for the time being, because I do not care to enter into the discussion of this question at this time, preferring to discuss it when the provision comes up regularly—but in view of those statements, your committee did not see fit to recommend to Congress a provision authorizing a Government armor-plate factory.

Mr. HOPKINS. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. FOSS. Certainly.

Mr. HOPKINS. The gentleman has given the estimate made by Admiral O'Neil. Does he remember that when Mr. Herbert was Secretary of the Navy an investigation on this subject was had, and it was reported by the Secretary that a Government armor-plate factory could be constructed for $1,500,000 in round numbers?

Mr. FOSS. I would say to my colleague that there have been various estimates made, but this is the last estimate.

Mr. HOPKINS. Was not that estimate made by Secretary Herbert, after a thorough investigation had been made, as to the cost of the manufacture of armor plate and the cost of establishing a plant by the Government?

Mr. FOSS. I do not recollect, Mr. Chairman, the exact estimate that was then submitted. But I know this, that this estimate which has been quoted here in the statement of Admiral O'Neil was made by a board of officers, who presented a very voluminous document upon the subject to Congress.

Mr. BARBER. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. FOSS. Certainly.

Mr. BARBER. It is not a fact that this estimate, to which the gentleman has referred, was an English estimate as to the cost of the establishment of such a plant; and whether it is not a fact that the armor-factory board, sent out by the Navy Department, found upon an investigation of the facts that the cost would be in the neighborhood of $3,300,000, instead of that which had been previously reported as to the English cost?

Mr. FOSS. That, I think, is true.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But the difference, the gentleman will find, as the report of Mr. Herbert will show, contemplated an establishment capable of yielding 3,000 tons, while the statement of the board quoted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania had reference to 6,000 tons.

And I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question. The gentleman, as I understand it, has stated that the committee desired to leave the subject of the establishment of an armor-plate factory or plant for the future. I want to ask if he, as the acting chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, is willing to adopt that suggestion and establish such a plant.

Mr. FOSS (interrupting). I would state, Mr. Chairman, to my friend from Alabama that when we reach that point in the bill I shall be moved largely by the considerations of the hour.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman recognizes, of course, that he can submit the point of order, and we can not get at the question on such an amendment.

Mr. FOSS. At this time I will not state whether I shall raise the point of order at that time or not. When we reach that point, as I have already said to the gentleman from Alabama, we will consider the question then presented.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But it would be quite satisfactory for this side of the House to hear the gentleman say that it is desirable that Congress should take the action proposed, and that he would not submit the point of order.

Mr. FOSS. But, Mr. Chairman, there is another branch of Congress where it will not be subject to the point of order.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I was only hoping that the House might have an opportunity of coming to a direct vote upon that question without the submission of the point of order.

Mr. OLMSTED. If the gentleman from Illinois will allow me, I would ask if it is not true that the cost of labor, the cost of material, and other matters entering into the construction of an armor plant have so increased as to largely increase the question of cost, and whether this increase has not grown up in the question of armor plate and armor manufacture since either or both of the reports to which reference has been made were submitted—that is, the report of Secretary Herbert and the other report to which the gentleman has referred?

Mr. FOSS. I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the board which was appointed by Secretary Long went into the matter thoroughly of the advisability of the Government constructing a factory for the manufacture of armor plate, and made a careful and thorough report on the subject. They went all over the country, as I know to be a fact, and reported back that the estimate for a factory of that character would involve a cost of about $3,747,000. Then Admiral O'Neil states that, owing to a marked increase in the cost of structural material, especially of steel, since the dates of the different reports, it was probable that the cost of construction of a plant should be increased to not less than 30 per cent, making a total of $4,872,000.

Mr. OLMSTED. Then the report of Secretary Herbert to which the gentleman from Illinois—your colleague, Mr. HOPKINS—called attention is not a proper comparison with the present prices of labor and material, both of which have increased largely since that report was made. Is that not a fact?

Mr. FOSS. I think so.

Mr. OLMSTED. I am satisfied from the statements made that the cost of labor and the cost of material have both increased largely since those reports were made.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of members of the committee to another matter of importance in connection with the pending bill. We have authorized here, under the head of "Increase in the Navy," 2 battle ships, 3 armored cruisers, and 3 protected cruisers. We believe that in this report we meet the just demands of the public sentiment in that regard. The committee has seen fit to authorize the building in private yards, by contract, of these vessels, because they do not think it advisable to recommend to Congress that these ships shall be built in the navy-yards of the Government, and without going into a general discussion of the matter, which I shall do when the provision comes up in the ordinary procedure in the consideration of the bill, I desire to say here and now only a word, and in that connection to quote from the testimony of Secretary Long on that proposition to show what moved in the minds of the committee in the preparation of this provision of the bill.

In answer to a question by one of the members of the committee upon this subject as to advisability of building ships in the navy-yards, Secretary Long, on page 11, says:

> My general impression is that it is not desirable, as it costs twice as much and takes twice as long. I think the records show that. In the next place, I think it is not desirable to introduce into our navy-yards something which is not permanent and continuous. There is a great desire among the laboring men in our navy-yards that we shall build these ships in them, but that will not increase the general employment of labor at all, because if the labor is not employed in the yards it will be employed outside, etc. I think, too, that there is more danger of a navy-yard becoming a factor in politics if the number of employees is so largely increased as it would be if shipbuilding were added to repairing.
> If we build a ship at New York we must build one at Norfolk, and there will be a pressure to build one at Boston, and one at Mare Island, and one at Philadelphia, and one at Port Royal and Key West and Portsmouth. Then will follow a demand for new buildings, machinery, plant, etc. If you start a ship at any one of these places you must employ a great many men, and as soon as it is finished all these must be discharged; and then there is trouble, especially for you. On the other hand, in the business of repairing ships there is regular, steady employment. I really think it is a great deal better in the interest of labor as it is.

Upon the statement of Secretary Long that it would practically cost the Government of the United States twice as much to build ships in Government navy-yards as it does in private yards and take a great deal longer; in view of that testimony, and in view of an abundance of other testimony which I desire to present when this provision comes up, the Naval Committee, charged with the great responsibility of appropriating the people's money and seeing to it that every dollar of that money appropriated should go the farthest, did not see fit to recommend to this House that we build our ships in Government navy-yards.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the committee to a part of this report which relates to the comparative strength of foreign navies with our own. You will see from a perusal of the different charts and maps that every nation in the world to-day is building upon a more gigantic scale than ever known before.

I may say that I have here in my hand a bill which is to-day pending in the Reichstag of Germany, and which is likely to pass, a bill which, if passed, will add to the German navy 422,000 tons of battle ships, armored cruisers, and protected cruisers, a larger tonnage than the German navy has to-day, a larger tonnage than we ourselves have; and if France and Russia and our own country do not keep up the pace, in 1916 the German nation will be the second great naval power upon the face of the globe.

Mr. KITCHIN. May I ask my colleague a question, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. FOSS. Certainly.

Mr. KITCHIN. As I understand, that German plan which you have just referred to covers a period of sixteen years?

Mr. FOSS. Sixteen years.

Mr. KITCHIN. Not a present appropriation.

Mr. FOSS. So far as the navies stand to-day, England is the first, France is the second, Russia is third, and the United States is fourth, by just about 2,720 tons ahead of Germany. Just a cruiser, for instance, the size of the Atlanta, one of the first cruisers which we authorized in the building up of the new Navy.

Now, I would like to say a few words in conclusion upon the general question, What are we building the Navy for? In the first place, we are building a navy for peace; not to provoke war, but to conserve international concord. That nation which is the best fitted to fight is the least likely to enter upon fight.

The international peace conference held at The Hague this last summer adopted a resolution that the peace conference is of the opinion that the governments taking into consideration the propositions made in this conference should make a study of the possibility of and agreement concerning the limitation of armed forces on land and sea, and of naval budgets.

It is a singular fact that after the adoption of that resolution the most gigantic naval programmes have been promulgated by some of the leading countries of the world. The German Emperor was not far from right when he said, "The best peace conference is a strong and efficient navy." Sea power is recognized more and more as the strength of a great nation.

And so we are building the Navy for peace. We are building the Navy also to maintain our foreign policy. We are building the Navy to maintain the Monroe doctrine, which a few years ago was resurrected into newness of life and clothed in the vigorous language of Richard Olney.

We are building the Navy to defend the proposed Nicaragua Canal, which, I trust, will never be built unless the American Navy has the right, as it has the ability, to defend it against all comers. [Loud applause.] We are building the Navy for commerce. For a hundred years all the thought and purpose of this country has been devoted toward the development of our own resources.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, would the gentleman from Illinois permit me to ask him a question there? When you speak of defending that great enterprise by the Navy, can you tell the committee the relative value of guns of the same caliber, one on land and the other on sea? Is it not true that one on land is said to be six times as effective as one on sea?

Mr. FOSS. I am not informed as to that.

Mr. HEPBURN. One having a permanent, stable platform and the other a constantly moving, oscillating platform.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. It can not go into so many places to meet the enemy.

Mr. FOSS. There would be some advantage in the one on land, but, as my friend from Michigan suggests, it could not go into so many places to meet the enemy.

Mr. HEPBURN. But if the enemy has an objective point, it might be there.

Mr. FOSS. True.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I would suggest to my friend from Iowa that I have read that it was estimated that a gun under those circumstances on land was three times as effective, but this is the first time I have heard that it was six times.

Mr. HEPBURN. If the gentleman from Illinois will excuse me, I will state that I had a conversation with one of the most distinguished naval officers we have living to-day, and he told me that the relative effectiveness was 1 to 6.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I would rather have the opinion of Admiral Farragut than that of Admiral Dewey.

Several members rose.

Mr. FOSS. I am very sorry that I can not yield to everybody.

Mr. BARTLETT. The court, in the claim of Admiral Dewey for prize money, decided that it was about three times, less than six months ago.

Mr. FOSS. I will say, gentlemen, that the great victories will be won hereafter on the sea.

We are building the Navy for commerce. For a hundred years this country has lived largely within itself and for itself, and all our thought and purpose has been devoted toward the building up of our own resources. Under the wise and beneficial system of protection this country has practically to-day made itself industrially independent of all the countries of the world. Protection has been the watchword of the past century—protection to American labor, to American industry, and to American homes—but I say to you that the watchword of the coming century will be "commerce."

Commerce will mean all that protection has meant and a great deal more. It will mean that we will not only build our own railroads, but at the same time we will send our locomotives to draw trains across the transcontinental roads of Asia and Europe. We will not only build our own bridges, but will build bridges to span the streams of Africa. It will mean that we will not only hold on to this home market of ours, the best in the world, but we will seek the markets of the Orient, and in the development of our commercial supremacy, which, in my mind, is sure to come, the Navy will play an important part.

By the mere logic of circumstances this country is bound in the next few years to be the greatest shipbuilding country on the face of the globe. I have here a statement which goes to prove that fact:

The foundation of steel and iron products is coal and iron ore. The total area of the British coal fields is 9,500 square miles. The total area of the United States coal fields is 197,000 square miles. In 1898 Great Britain consumed, in round figures, 18,000,000 tons of iron ore, of which one-third was imported—nearly 6,000,000 tons. Shipbuilding depends upon the development and expansion of the iron and steel industry. We now make 50 per cent more pig iron than either Great Britain or Germany, or more than one-third of the iron made in the world.

We make half as much steel as all the other nations put together; and when you take into consideration the fact that the raw material for our ships and the ships of the world is iron and coal, I say to you that by reason of our large supply here and the small supply over there, this country is to-day upon the eve of the greatest progress in the shipbuilding industry ever made.

Why, when we think that seventeen years ago we had practically no shipbuilding industry in this country, and find that which we had was discredited, that we had to go abroad for all the materials which enter into their construction and for the forgings, armor, and everything, almost, and that to-day we are not only supplying American ships, fashioned by American hands out of American raw material for ourselves, but at the same time building them for Japan, and building them for Russia and some of the other nations of the world, this country has made tremendous progress in the march of naval construction.

We are building the Navy for peace, for the maintenance of our foreign policy, for commerce, and then we are building our Navy for civilization. This country embarked in the war with Spain for the purpose of freeing the suffering Cubans from the tyranny of Spanish rule.

Under the rules of war, to fight our enemy where she was the most vulnerable was one of the first principles of successful warfare; and so, forced by the canons of international law to leave the harbor of Hongkong, the fleet of Dewey made for the harbor of Manila, and there in the memorable engagement with the Spanish fleet won the day, and the Spanish sovereignty of the Philippines passed by the rules of war over to ourselves. This was later ratified by the treaty of peace.

Whether it would have been better for Dewey to have sailed away and left these islands and those people to the jarring of domestic tribes, to become eventually the spoils of other nations, it is too late now to discuss. What their future may be I do not know. Perchance we may annex them permanently to ourselves, or we may civilize them until they arrive at that stage of civilization and of progress where they can erect a government of their own, a republic whose influence will penetrate through all the darkened portions of the Orient and start the fires of liberty on every altar. But that I leave to destiny and the future to reveal.

This I know, that our duty now is clear; our duty is to civilize those people, and toward that end there will be ten thousand ministering angels. The American school-teacher with her spelling book may enlighten the mind; the American missionary with his Bible may soften the heart; the American tourist and the American traveler may teach them the rules of living and the laws of trade; but I say to you that in the immediate years, while these people are barbarous as they are to-day and half civilized—when they recognize no virtue that is not accompanied by force—that the American battleship, fashioned by American hands, filled by American seamen, answering to every call and command, with an American flag above it that never waved over any people but to bless and save. [Applause.] I say that the American battle ship, that never bore a commission of duty but what it carried a message of hope, will do more to civilize these people than the ten thousand sweeter and gentler influences which mold the minds of more civilized people. [Applause.] It will teach them that liberty is not license, but that all true liberty is liberty under law, respect for order, and reverence for justice.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed to conclude his remarks.

There was no objection.

Mr. FOSS. I thank the gentleman. I say, Mr. Chairman, we are building up our Navy, building it up for peace, for the maintenance of our national honor, for commerce, for civilization, these mighty human instrumentalities which to-day are moving in the world and working out "that perfect liberty of mankind," the liberty of enlightened conscience, the liberty of regenerated humanity, the liberty of Christian statesmanship—that liberty, in short, which, under the benign rulings of Almighty God, is the great and peculiar mission of our country to advance. [Applause.]

APPENDIX.

[House Report No. 999, Fifty-sixth Congress, first session.]

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. Foss, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, submitted the following report, to accompany H. R. 10450:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred so much of the President's annual message as relates to the naval establishment, together with the annual estimates of the Navy Department, submit herewith a bill (H. R. 10450) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, with the following statement:

The amount carried by this bill is $61,209,916.67, the largest ever reported to the House from the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Appropriations for current fiscal year.

Naval appropriation act, March 3, 1899	$48,099,909.58
Urgent deficiency act, February 9, 1900	4,255,000.00
Urgent deficiency (reappropriated)	350,000.00
Additional urgent deficiency	645,000.00
Total	53,344,909.58

The total estimates of the Department, supplemental and otherwise, amounted to $69,885,634.67. In the Book of Estimates they appear much larger, but this is due to a clerical error of $5,962,402, which was made at the Department but afterwards rectified. The committee carefully scrutinized the estimates of the different bureaus, and without curtailing the work or usefulness of any, made such deductions, after hearing the several bureau chiefs, as in its judgment it believed to be in accordance with careful and judicious expenditure of money during the coming fiscal year. These deductions amounted to $8,675,718.

This bill, therefore, carries a proposed increase of appropriations over the naval appropriation act of last year of $13,109,947.00, and a total increase over all acts of $7,864,947.00. This increase, as will be seen from the table of estimates, is due largely to the improvements of our yards and docks, the construction and repair of our vessels, and the increase of the Navy.

This bill, following the custom of years, is divided into general headings, making appropriations for the different bureaus and departments of the naval establishment, as follows.

PAY OF THE NAVY.

The pay of the Navy in this bill is $12,810,897, which is made up from the following table:

Pay of 1,751 officers on the active list	$4,104,809
Commutation of quarters for officers	200,000
Pay of 284 naval cadets under instruction	142,000
Pay of 536 officers on the retired list	1,190,801
Pay of Admiral's secretary	2,500
Pay of 140 clerks	184,800
Pay of 17,500 petty officers, seamen, and other enlisted men	6,300,000
Pay of 2,500 apprentice boys at training stations and on board training ships	450,000
Pay of 20 mates (section 1408, Revised Statutes)	18,000
Pay of enlisted men on the retired list	40,210
Extra pay of petty officers and seamen reenlisting under honorable discharge	164,687
To pay interest on deposits by enlisted men (act February 9, 1889)	13,000
Total	12,810,897

This is a decrease of $689,274 from the last naval appropriation act, by reason of the fact that the appropriation made last year was based upon the hurried estimates prepared in accordance with the personnel act, which was passed on the last day of the session, the same day on which the naval appropriation act was passed, and also for the reason that an additional amount was required last year to pay officers and men who were engaged in temporary service in the Navy during the late war with Spain.

Under "Pay, miscellaneous," the appropriation this year is the same as that of last year, with the exception that there has been an additional appropriation of $10,000, to enable the Secretary of the Navy to transport home the remains of officers and enlisted men of the Navy and Marine Corps who die or are killed in action outside of the United States. Following this is a provision providing for an emergency fund of $500,000, which is necessary to meet unforeseen contingencies constantly arising in view of the unsettled condition in our insular possessions. This sum is to be expended in the discretion of the President.

BUREAU OF NAVIGATION.

This Bureau has general jurisdiction over the officers and men of the Navy, their training and assignment; also the movement of vessels in the Navy and their complement of officers and men. It has charge of the compilation of the Naval Register and preparation, revision, and enforcement of all tactics, drill books, signal codes, cipher codes, and the uniform regulations. It also has general supervision of the Naval Academy and technical school for officers (except the War College and Torpedo School).

The following is a statement of the estimates of the Bureau for the fiscal year 1901, with the appropriations carried by this bill and the appropriations for the current fiscal year:

	Estimates for 1901.	Appropriated, 1901.	Appropriated, 1900.
Transportation, recruiting, and contingent	$80,000	$80,000	$60,000
Gunnery exercise	12,000	12,000	12,000
Outfits for naval apprentices	112,500	112,500	112,500

Naval training stations:
California, maintenance	30,000	30,000	30,000
California, buildings	34,750	34,750	50,000
Rhode Island, maintenance	45,000	45,000	30,000
Rhode Island, buildings	54,500	54,050	125,000
Naval War College, Rhode Island, maintenance	9,200	9,200	9,200
Naval Home, Philadelphia	76,425	76,425	76,425
Supplemental estimate (H. Doc. No. 398)	9,550	----------	----------
Total	463,925	566,425	505,125

The total increase of appropriations under this Bureau amounts to $61,300. This increase is more than accounted for by the provision inserted in the bill appropriating for outfits for landsmen training for seamen, which is earnestly recommended by the Secretary of the Navy and the chief of the Bureau. In view of the fact that it has been found difficult to enlist the full quota of men, some encouragement of this character has become necessary. It is believed that this provision will not only provide the full quota of enlisted men, but at the same time will have a tendency to improve the character of the applicants and also induce a larger number of our own citizens to become part of the personnel of the Navy. At the present time 88 per cent of the whole number of our petty officers and enlisted men are citizens of the United States, while 65 per cent of the remainder have declared their intention to become citizens. Of the other enlisted men 75 per cent are citizens and of the remainder 48 per cent have declared their intention to become citizens, while as to apprentices, over 91 per cent are native born.

Provision is made under this Bureau for the maintenance of our two important naval training stations, one at Yerba Buena Island, California, and the other at Coasters Harbor Island, Rhode Island, where our young men are trained in the duties of seamen. The training station in California has been recently established, and provision is made in this bill for a completion of the work. The training station at Newport, R. I., has been established for some years, and during the last year the number of apprentices under instruction was 1,027. Provision has also been made for the maintenance of the War College at Newport.

BUREAU OF ORDNANCE.

This Bureau has general charge of the ordnance of the Navy and the armor and armament of vessels, the torpedo station and magazines on shore, and designs the interior arrangements of all buildings erected for its use at navy-yards, as well as the machinery used for handling ammunition on ship, the interior of the turrets, and the arrangement of guns, and the distribution of armor thereon. All torpedoes, powder, guns, and war explosives of all kinds, and armor plate, are bought and manufactured under its supervision. It has control of all details of its own administration.

The following table gives the estimates for the next fiscal year, the amount carried by this bill, and the amounts appropriated for the current fiscal year:

	Estimates, 1901.	Carried by bill, 1901.	Appropriated, 1900.
Ordnance and ordnance stores	$1,805,500	$1,705,500	$1,875,000

Torpedo station, Newport, R. I.	65,000	65,000	65,000
Repairs, Bureau of Ordnance	30,000	30,000	30,000
Puget Sound Naval Station, buildings	80,000	80,000	----------
Arming and equipping naval militia	60,000	60,000	60,000
Contingent, Bureau of Ordnance	30,000	30,000	15,000
Naval magazine, Norfolk, Va	20,000	20,000	27,500
Naval magazine, Dover, N. H	100,000	100,000	----------
Naval magazine, Fort Lafayette, N. Y	15,000	15,000	5,000
Naval proving ground, Indian Head, Md	15,000	----------	----------
Civil establishment	32,624	32,624	32,624
Naval magazine, New York Harbor	----------	----------	600,000
Naval magazine, Fort Mifflin, Pa	----------	----------	68,000
Machinery for ordnance building, League Island	----------	----------	60,000
Steam lighter, navy-yard, League Island	----------	----------	80,000
Total	2,503,124	2,388,124	3,143,124

It will be seen from the above table that the total appropriations for this Bureau are $755,000 less than that appropriated for the present fiscal year. There is an increase in the appropriation for the improvement of the gun factory at Washington, made necessary by the expansion of the Department incident to the increase in the Navy, while there is a decrease of the appropriation for the purchase of smokeless powder to $500,000, which, it is believed, will satisfy the demands of the Department for the coming year. An ordnance shop and two magazine buildings are required at Puget Sound naval station, owing to the fact that there are no facilities at this station for ordnance material, and an appropriation of $80,000 has been recommended therefor. Also the improvements in connection with the naval magazine at Norfolk are strongly recommended by the Department, and for which an appropriation of $20,000 is urged.

The naval magazine at Dover, N. J., which is the main depot of supplies, is in need of new storehouse, magazine, light, heat, and power plant, and other improvements, for which the committee recommend an appropriation of $100,000. The regular appropriations for providing reserve guns for auxiliary cruisers, the torpedo station at Newport, arming and equipping Naval Militia, and the maintenance of the Ordnance Department are the same, while the items carried by the last act, but omitted from this bill, will be seen in the above table.

BUREAU OF EQUIPMENT.

The duties of this Bureau consist in furnishing the coal and general equipment of vessels. It also has charge of the manufacture of rope, anchors, cables, rigging, sails, galleys, and cooking utensils, and a portion of the electrical machinery for ships; also of the Naval Observatory, Nautical Almanac and compass offices, and all details of its own administration. The following table shows the estimates, the amount of appropriations proposed in the bill, and the amounts carried by the last appropriation act:

Civil establishment	17,475.00	19,052.52	17,475.00
Supplemental estimate (H. Doc. 398):
Coal wharf, Cavite	300,000.00	----------	----------
Equipment plant, Cavite	20,000.00	20,000.00	----------
Civil establishment	1,577.52	----------	----------
Total	3,564,052.52	3,464,052.52	2,765,455.10

As will be seen from the above table, there is an increase in the appropriations for this Bureau of $698,597.42, owing to the increase in the number of ships, and also to the necessity of establishing coaling stations in our insular possessions; $375,000 of this increase is in the item of equipment of vessels. The appropriation for this year was $375,000 short of what was absolutely necessary, and this amount was appropriated in the urgent deficiency act. There is an increase of $300,000 over that of the present year for coaling stations. A part of this appropriation, if made, will be spent in establishing coal sheds and a wharf at Cavite, P. I., capable of holding 25,000 tons of coal. This is made necessary by the fact that we have a large number of the ships of the Navy there, and between five and six thousand tons of coal per month are required for them. Coal is now stored in the open, and is consequently liable to rapid deterioration. An appropriation of $20,000 is strongly urged for the purchase of the necessary tools and appliances for the enlargement and increased facilities of the equipment plant at Cavite, which the committee favorably recommend. This is done in view of the fact that without it our vessels would be obliged to go to Hongkong, some 700 miles away, in case of needed repairs.

The appropriation of $100,000 for ocean and lake surveys is the same as that in the last naval appropriation act. The Navy Department has been making surveys on the coast of Cuba and Guam, the Philippines, and the Hawaiian Islands, and are in condition to continue this work, which is so important to navigation.

The Navy has done this work ever since its establishment, and it is the peculiar province of the Navy to do it. They are the men who sail the seas and whose duty it is to know every shoal, reef, and rock. They can do it more economically than any other bureau or department of the Government, because their ships carry on board all the instruments for making proper surveys, and in time of peace the Navy can be usefully employed in this important work. The other appropriations under this bureau are practically the same as those for the current year, including the civil establishment.

BUREAU OF YARDS AND DOCKS.

This is the civil engineering bureau of the Department and has charge of the construction of buildings and their maintenance in the several navy-yards, also of all docks and shore structures of all kinds, such as quay walls, wharfs, etc., for which it estimates. It also has charge of all topographical improvements in such yards, Newport, R. I., Annapolis, Md., and the Naval Home, Philadelphia, the magazines and hospitals outside of navy-yards, and the buildings for which it does not estimate being excepted from its jurisdiction. The part of the naval appropriation bill under public works is estimated for by this bureau.

The following table shows the estimates for the fiscal year 1901, the proposed appropriations in this bill, and the amounts carried by the last appropriation act:

Comparative statement.

	Estimates, 1901.	Carried by bill.	Appropriated, 1900.
YARDS AND DOCKS.
Maintenance	$420,000.00	$475,000.00	$350,000.00

Contingent	20,000.00	----------	----------
Total	753,322.83	608,439.83	453,442.23

As will be seen from the above table, the increase this year over that of the last appropriation act is $154,997.60. Of this increase $125,000 is for the maintenance of yards and docks, which is made necessary in view of the fact that the Navy Department has taken possession of the naval stations in Habana, Cuba; San Juan, Porto Rico; Manila, Philippine Islands, all of which require to be maintained and kept in a proper state of preservation. There is also an increase under the item of contingent expenses of $30,000, due partly to the fact that there is a deficiency in the present fiscal year. The other items under this Bureau are substantially the same as the last year.

The necessity for increased appropriations in this important branch of the naval establishment has been set forth in the able report of the Secretary of the Navy, on page 41, in which he says:

"The operations of the various bureaus at the yards during the war show that in very many respects the public works were not adequately equipped for the prompt and proper conduct of the work of repairing and fitting out vessels of war. Even in such navy-yards as New York, Norfolk, and Mare Island, the best equipped in the country, many deficiencies were found to exist. This was the experience of every bureau, and the importance of modernizing the navy-yard plants, erecting new storehouses and shops, providing adequate docking facilities, and thereby enabling the yards to meet the great increased requirements of the Navy was strongly impressed upon the Department."

The following table shows the value of the real estate, chattels, and machinery plants at the various yards and stations June 30, 1899:

The above indicates the magnitude of these yards and stations. It is here that the ships are taken for repair and fully equipped for further service, and as the number of ships increases a corresponding improvement in our yards and stations follows as a necessary sequence in order that they may be able to meet the requirements of a growing navy. The two must go hand in hand. While the committee has not seen fit to recommend what has been asked for to the full extent, yet they have made provision for that amount of public works which can be judiciously carried on during the coming fiscal year. Under the head of public works is that of the completion of the dry docks which are now being built at Portsmouth, Boston, League Island, Mare Island, and the floating dock at Algiers, La., requiring an appropriation of $1,550,000. There has already been appropriated for these docks $1,800,000, making a total of $3,250,000, and $1,800,000 more will be required to complete them.

This bill also provides for the beginning of construction of two more stone dry docks, one at New York and the other at Norfolk, Va. These are urgently demanded by the Department in view of the importance of these two yards, that of New York being the largest and most important and that of Norfolk next. At the present time we have no docks at either place large enough to take in our largest battle ships with safety.

Under "Public Works" is a provision for barracks for enlisted men at New York and Mare Island, to take the place of receiving ships. The Vermont is the receiving ship at New York, and is in extremely bad shape and unfit for the purpose for which it is used. The one at Mare Island, the Independence, is but little better. Our Government is the last of the maritime nations to adopt the barracks system for its seamen. Every other nation has them. The British Government has already expended $7,600,000 for the purpose of properly housing their seamen. France, Germany, Italy, Russia, Austria, Japan, have already constructed barracks for their seamen.

There are many reasons which are urged in support of the establishment of barracks; among others, that of the health of the men, economy of administration, and the proper recreation for the men. Indeed, it has been estimated that there will be an annual saving to the Government of $150,000 if barracks were substituted in the place of receiving ships at Boston, New York, League Island, Norfolk, and Mare Island.

NAVAL ACADEMY.

The Naval Academy was founded in 1845 by the Hon. George Bancroft, Secretary of the Navy in the Administration of President James K. Polk, and was located at Annapolis, Md., on land occupied by Fort Severn, which was given up by the War Department for the purpose, where it has since remained, except for a short period during the civil war, when it was removed to Newport, R. I.

Reports of the Department and Boards of Visitors have been made from time to time as to the inadequacy and unsafe condition of many of the buildings, some of them being 50 years old, and in the act of May 4, 1898, Congress authorized the Secretary of the Navy to erect a building for an armory at a cost not to exceed $300,000, a boathouse at a cost not to exceed $90,000, a power house at a cost not to exceed $100,000, four double houses for officers' quarters to cost not more than $60,000; for grading, electric-light wiring, removing old buildings, and preparing plant at a cost not to exceed $90,000, and to construct a line of sea wall and for dredging and filling, $150,000, and appropriated $500,000 toward the construction of such work. In the last act, for the purpose of continuing such work, Congress appropriated $720,000 more, making a total of $1,220,000 already appropriated for new work at the Academy.

In this bill the committee recommend an appropriation of $350,000 to begin the erection of a building suitable for cadets' quarters at a cost not exceeding $2,500,000. The present cadets' quarters have already been condemned, and the Board of Visitors in their report strongly recommend that new cadets' quarters should be begun as soon as possible. While the Department recommend in their estimate a building to cost not exceeding $3,536,000, which would accommodate cadets to the number of about 500, yet the committee concluded that a building costing $2,500,000 could be built sufficiently large for all present and immediate future needs upon a plan which would allow the addition of wings to be built, as any future increased number of cadets might require. They also recommend the appropriation of $50,000 for foundations for a general storehouse and building for department of steam engineering, which can be made to greater advantage and economy now than later. Two hundred thousand dollars is also recommended for building the sea wall, which is necessary at this time.

The committee also recommend an appropriation of $25,000 for the restoration of the colonial and historical building now used as a library building, but which shall hereafter be used as a residence for the superintendent of the Academy; and for grading and paving, electric-light wiring, and the erection of a temporary electric-light plant, etc., $50,000. The estimates of the Department call for an appropriation of $361,000 toward the purchase of additional lands along the southeasterly line of the Academy grounds, and the Board of Visitors in their report recommend "That, in view of the prospective need of the Academy, it seems to be absolutely necessary that the southeasterly line of the Academy grounds be extended so as to include within the grounds" certain blocks of land, which in their report it is estimated would cost $461,000, including the removal of buildings, grading, etc.

In view of this recommendation made by the board and the estimates asked for in this connection by the Department the committee have seen fit to recommend that—

"The Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized and directed to ascertain and report to Congress at its next session what additional grounds, if any, are, in his judgment, needed for the uses of the United States Naval Academy at Annapolis, Md., and to embody in such report a statement showing the estimated actual value of any additional land required in the aggregate, the value, respectively, of the separate parcels into which such lands may be divided, and the prices in detail, at which all additional lands needed, whether acquired as a whole or in separate tracts, can be obtained."

Your committee, while recognizing the importance of rebuilding this institution, have felt constrained to recommend an appropriation somewhat smaller than the estimates, believing that the amount herein recommended is all that can be judiciously expended during the coming fiscal year and that the continuation of the work by degrees from year to year under a careful scrutiny of expenditure will result in the ultimate completion of these new buildings with much more economy than if large appropriations are made.

NAVAL OBSERVATORY.

The appropriation recommended for grounds and roads at the Naval Observatory is the same this year as last, namely, $10,000. The only new provision is that for a building suitable for a dwelling for the foreman and captain of the watch, $2,500, which is urgently needed.

Naval Observatory.	Estimates, 1901.	Carried by bill.	Appropriated, 1900.
Grounds and roads	$10,000	$10,000	$10,000
New buildings	2,500	2,500
Do	18,000
Total	30,500	12,500	10,000

BUREAU OF MEDICINE AND SURGERY.

The duties of this Bureau are implied in its title, and comprise all that relates to laboratories, naval hospitals, and dispensaries. It designs various buildings erected within the navy-yard for its own purposes, so far as their internal arrangements are concerned, and has control of the same after completion. It designs, builds, and maintains all buildings erected for its own purposes outside of navy-yards, and generally, estimates for and controls all the details of its own organization.

The following table shows the appropriation for last year, the estimates for the fiscal year 1901, and the appropriation recommended by this bill:

Medicine and Surgery.	Estimates, 1901.	Carried by bill.	Appropriated, 1900.
Medical Department	$75,000	$95,000	$75,000
Naval hospital fund	20,000	40,000	20,000
Contingent	30,000	30,000	30,000
Repairs	20,000	20,000	20,000
Naval hospital, New York	5,000	5,000
Naval hospital, Newport, R. I	20,000	20,000
Naval hospital, Mare Island	10,000	10,000
H. Doc. 388:
Medical Department	20,000
Naval hospital fund	30,000
Cemetery, Chelsea, Mass			2,500
Naval hospital, Chelsea, Mass			45,000
Total	220,000	220,000	192,500

The total increase for this Department amounts to $27,500. This is due to the fact that the necessities of the Bureau are growing in consequence of the increase in the number of men, and also for the reason that supplies have to be sent to our men abroad.

Improvements and additions to our naval hospitals at Newport, New York, and Mare Island are also herein recommended.

A new provision has been inserted providing for an increased number of surgeons, passed assistant and assistant surgeons in the Navy. The surgeons hereafter shall consist of 55. This will be an increase of 5 as now allowed by law. The number of passed assistant and assistant surgeons shall be 110, who shall have rank with the assistant surgeons in the Army. This will be an increase of 20; and it is provided that the assistant surgeons who have made a creditable record during the war with Spain, now in the volunteer service, may be given permanent commissions without limitation as to age.

In recommending this increase the Surgeon-General in his letter to the Secretary of the Navy states that the increased number asked for is imperatively necessary. "In view of the large addition to the enlisted force of the Navy and the establishment of hospitals and sick quarters in the Philippines, Porto Rico, Guam, and Habana, it is simply impossible with the present force to provide adequate medical attendance. Ships and stations are left without assistant surgeons, and the Medical Department of the Navy can not be conducted in the efficient condition that it is the desire of the Department to maintain."

The committee recommend a provision in the nature of an amendment to section 13 of the personnel act, providing that nothing therein contained shall operate to reduce the pay which but for the passage of such act would be received by any commissioned officer. There was such a provision in the personnel act, but under the construction placed by the Comptroller of the Treasury there are a few officers in the Medical Corps whose pay is very materially cut down, as, for instance, that of Passed Assistant Surgeon Urie, whose pay is cut down $600 a year and is likely to continue so for some four or five years.

BUREAU OF SUPPLIES AND ACCOUNTS.

Generally speaking, this is the financial Bureau of the Department. Its duties comprise all that relates to requiring for or preparing provisions, clothing, small stores, and contingent stores of the Pay Department; the purchase of all supplies for the naval establishment except medicines and surgical appliances and instruments and supplies for the Marine Corps, and the keeping of a proper system of accounts of the same. Like the other bureaus, it estimates for and controls its own administration.

The following statement shows the estimates, the amount carried by this bill, and the amount appropriated for the current fiscal year:

Supplies and Accounts.	Estimates, 1901.	Carried by bill.	Appropriated, 1900.
Provisions, Navy	$3,000,000.00	$2,500,000.00	$3,000,000.00
Contingent	150,000.00	150,000.00	150,000.00
Civil establishment	70,432.03	81,232.03	70,432.03
H. Doc. 398, civil establishment	10,800.00
Total	3,231,232.03	2,731,232.03	3,220,432.03

From the above table it will be seen that the amount carried by this bill is decreased $489,250 from that of the current year. The appropriations carried by the last act were somewhat larger than necessary, and it is likely that a large balance will be left over. Consequently the committee thought it advisable to reduce the appropriation to what is believed to be the actual needs and necessities of the Bureau.

BUREAU OF CONSTRUCTION AND REPAIR.

The duties of this Bureau comprise all that relate to the designing, building, fitting, and repairing the hulls of ships, their turrets, spars, capstans, windlasses, steering gear, and ventilating apparatus, and, in conjunction with the Bureau of Ordnance, designing the construction of ammunition hoists, their shafts, machinery, and appurtenances; placing and securing armor; placing and securing on board ship the armament and its accessories as manufactured and supplied by the Bureau of Ordnance. It has charge of the care and preservation of ships in reserve, the docking of ships, the designing of slips, and the internal arrangement of the various buildings and shops under its control, and estimates for and controls its own administration.

The following table shows the estimates for 1901, the amount carried by this bill, and the amounts appropriated for 1900:

Construction and Repair.	Estimates, 1901.	Carried by bill.	Appropriated, 1900.
Construction and repair of vessels	$6,000,000.00	$6,000,000.00	$3,000,000.00
Steel lighters:
Navy-yard, Portsmouth	50,000.00
Navy-yard, Boston	10,000.00
Construction plant:
Portsmouth	25,000.00	25,000.00	25,000.00
Boston	25,000.00	25,000.00	25,000.00
New York	25,000.00	25,000.00	25,000.00
League Island	25,000.00	25,000.00	25,000.00
Norfolk	25,000.00	25,000.00	55,000.00
Pensacola	5,000.00	5,000.00	25,000.00
Mare Island	25,000.00	25,000.00	25,000.00
Port Royal	5,000.00	5,000.00	25,000.00
Algiers	25,000.00	25,000.00
Puget Sound	25,000.00	25,000.00	25,000.00
Civil establishment	25,824.25	25,824.25	23,407.00
Construction plant, Key West			25,000.00
H. Doc. 398, construction and repair	500,000.00
Total	6,795,824.25	6,225,824.25	3,273,407.00

From the above table it will be seen that there is a large increase in the appropriation proposed for this Bureau, or, in other words, $2,962,407.25 over that of the current year. This increase is practically in one item, that of construction and repair of vessels. As we are increasing the number of our vessels we must necessarily provide for the r preservation and repair. We have also to consider in this connection that our vessels have just come out of a war in need of a larger measure of repair than would be necessary in time of peace.

BUREAU OF STEAM ENGINEERING.

The duties of this Bureau comprise all that relates to designing, building, fitting out, and repairing the steam machinery used for the propulsion of ships, and practically all of the machinery for which steam is the motive power on board ship. Like the other bureaus, it designs the internal arrangement of its various shops at the navy yard and estimates for and controls its own administration.

The following table shows the estimates for the fiscal year 1901, the amount carried by this bill, and the amounts appropriated for the current fiscal year:

Steam Engineering.	Estimates, 1901.	Carried by bill.	Appropriated, 1900.
Completion, repairing, etc	$1,585,000	$1,585,000	$380,000
Purchasing, handling stores, etc	900,000	900,000	400,000
Incidental expenses	15,000	15,000	10,000
Contingent	1,000	1,000	1,000
Machinery plant:
Portsmouth	25,000	25,000
Boston	50,000	50,000
Mare Island	50,000	50,000
Algiers	25,000	25,000
Honolulu	25,000	25,000
San Juan	25,000	25,000
Civil establishment	13,200	13,200	13,200
Machinery plant:
Norfolk			15,000
Puget Sound			25,000
League Island			15,000
New York			50,000
Total	2,774,200	2,774,200	1,209,200

The above table indicates an increase in the appropriation over that of the current year of $1,565,200. The same reasons which are urged in support of the increase under the Bureau of Construction and Repair apply to this Bureau as well. Appropriations are also recommended for machinery plants at Portsmouth, N. H., and Boston, Mass., of $25,000 and $50,000, respectively; $50,000 for machinery plant at Mare Island, Cal.; $25,000 for machinery plant at the naval station, Algiers, La., and $25,000 each for machinery plants at the naval stations at Honolulu and San Juan, in order to fully equip them for the needs of the service.

NAVAL ACADEMY (CIVIL ESTABLISHMENT).

The following table shows the estimates for 1901, the amount carried by the bill, and the amount appropriated for the fiscal year 1900:

Naval Academy.	Estimates, 1901.	Carried by bill.	Appropriated, 1900.
Pay of professors and others	$57,659.00	$59,991.00	$55,459.00
Pay of watchmen, mechanics, and others	45,529.95	44,069.95	44,069.95
Pay of steam employees	7,824.50	7,824.50	7,824.50
Pay of special course	3,000.00	3,000.00	3,000.00
Repairs	25,000.00	21,000.00	21,000.00
Heating and lighting	20,000.00	20,000.00	20,000.00
Contingent	48,800.00	43,800.00	43,800.00
Total	207,813.45	199,685.45	195,153.45

This is the regular appropriation for the civil establishment of the Academy, and the increase over that of the current year will be seen to amount to $4,532. This is due to the addition of a professor in Spanish, at $2,300, and increase in the salary of the assistant librarian of $400; an increase in the pay of 21 first-class musicians from $340 each to $420 each, and that of 7 second-class musicians from $300 to $360 each.

NAVAL CADETS.

The same provision providing for the restoration of the title of midshipman and the abolishment of the two years' course at sea, as contained in the personnel bill of last year, is herein inserted in this bill. This provision passed the House, but failed to become a law. It restores the time-honored title of mid-shipman, which was abolished by act of March 5, 1862. Midshipman was a term used to designate the young men who were being trained for naval officers, and is deemed more appropriate than the present appellation.

The discontinuance of the two years' course at sea is something that has been felt by naval officers for many years to be desirable. It gives the cadets their commissions at the end of four years, the same as at West Point, instead of at the end of six years, as now allowed by law, but the abolition of the two years' sea course becomes all the more necessary at this time by reason of the fact that we have to-day a scarcity of officers. In 1872 we added on this two years' sea course for the reason that owing to the decadence of our Navy we did not need officers; but now things have changed. In Senate Document No. 168 in this Congress, the Secretary of the Navy shows in a tabulated statement prepared by the Bureau of Navigation that we need an increase of 607 officers in addition to those we have already on the active list to give a full complement to all ships now in commission and those which could be placed in commission within thirty days in case of urgent necessity. This provision will give a most substantial increase, and in the report of the Chief of the Bureau of Navigation is strongly recommended in these words:

"One of the most important features of the bill (personnel bill) was stricken out, however, before it became a law, and by the omission of this feature—the change from the six-year to the four-year course at the Naval Academy—the number of commissioned officers intended to be provided was so largely reduced that it becomes necessary to ask that some relief be immediately furnished. The Bureau recommends that this serious omission be corrected and that the largely increased demands for officers for important service be met by increasing the number of officers in each grade by 10 per cent and by providing for the four years' course at the Naval Academy."

The Marine Corps is the military branch of the naval service and has made a commendable record.

The following table shows the estimates for 1901, the amounts carried by this bill, and the amounts appropriated for the current fiscal year:

Marine Corps.	Estimates, 1901.	Carried by bill.	Appropriated, 1900.
Pay	$1,694,054.23	$1,694,054.23	$1,597,879.23

Contingent	5,000.00
Total	2,740,370.27	2,712,870.27	2,544,271.27

The above table shows an increase over that of the current year of $167,599. This is due to the fact that under the personnel law the Marine Corps was increased in the number of officers and men. At the present time the Marine Corps consists of 1 brigadier-general commandant, 1 adjutant and inspector (colonel), 1 assistant adjutant and inspector (major), 1 quartermaster (colonel), 2 assistant quartermasters (majors), 3 assistant quartermasters (captains), 1 paymaster (colonel), 1 assistant paymaster (major), 4 colonels, 5 lieutenant-colonels, 10 majors, 37 captains, 44 first lieutenants, 37 second lieutenants, and noncommissioned officers and musicians and privates aggregating 4,537 as the number comprised in the corps on the 31st day of January, 1900.

An increase of $7,000 has been made in the appropriation over that of the current year for the renting, leasing, improvement, and erection of barracks in view of the necessities in our foreign stations, where a large number of marines are now doing efficient service. Appropriations are further recommended for additions to barracks at New York, Portsmouth, and Washington, and the erection of new barracks at League Island, and an increase in the size of the prison at Mare Island, and for officers' quarters at Sitka, Alaska, $1,000, in addition to the unexpended balance of an appropriation made in the act of June 10, 1896; in all, $140,500.

INCREASE OF THE NAVY.

This is the last general heading of the naval appropriation bill and one which appeals more strongly to the interest and sentiment of the people. It will be observed by an examination of the following table that the committee has recommended an appropriation to the full amount of the estimates asked for by the Department:

	Estimates, 1901.	Carried by bill.	Appropriated, 1900.
Construction and machinery	*$12,740,699	$12,740,699	$5,992,402
Armor and armament	4,000,000	4,000,000	4,000,000
Equipment	250,000	250,000	400,000
Total	16,990,699	16,990,699	10,392,402

*This was originally $18,733,101, but was corrected by the Department.

We already have under construction, as shown by the Department's report of last December, 61 vessels, as follows:

*Sailing vessel.

The above accounts for the large increase in the appropriation of $6,748,297 over that of the last appropriation act under the head of "Construction and machinery," which is used toward the completion of vessels now in process of construction. This work must go on year by year until the vessels are in commission. Since that time the Kearsarge has been put in commission. She is regarded as having the most powerful ordnance of any battle ship in the Navy at the present time. The distinctive feature of her armament is that of four 13-inch guns, with four 8-inch guns in superposed turrets. She is probably the most powerful fighting ship afloat, and is the acme of modern naval architecture and mechanism.

ARMOR AND ARMAMENT.

Under the act of May 4, 1898, the battle ships Maine, Ohio, and Missouri were authorized, and the provision was inserted in that act providing that $400 per ton should be the maximum price to be paid for armor. Harveyized armor could have been purchased for the battle ships at that price, but it was the opinion of the Department that the best armor was none too good. The act of March 3, 1899, provided that no armor for the ships above mentioned, as well as for those authorized by that act, should be purchased unless at a price not exceeding $300 per ton. This is the situation to-day. As regards these ships, it is important that the Secretary of the Navy should have authority to contract for their armor at once, otherwise their construction will be delayed at a great loss to the Government.

The battle ships above mentioned—the Maine, Ohio, and Missouri, now in process of construction—require 7,359.42 tons of armor, or 2,453.14 for each vessel. It is believed by the committee that these battle ships of nearly 13,000 tons displacement, the largest in design which have ever been planned by the Navy Department, should have the best obtainable armor, and accordingly your committee recommend that the Secretary of the Navy be authorized to contract for such armor at a cost not to exceed $545 per ton. The best obtainable armor at the present time is, according to all naval authorities, the so-called Krupp armor, which is, at least, and has been so proven by ballistic tests, of 25 per cent greater efficiency than that of the harveyized armor. Every nation in the world is using the Krupp armor to-day. Your committee believe that it is little short of disloyalty to recommend any other than the best protection and the best armor for these battle ships to be placed between the bodies of our officers and men and the bullets of the enemy.

Under the last naval appropriation act Congress authorized the construction of the three battle ships Georgia, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey, and three armed cruisers, West Virginia, Nebraska, and California, but inserted a provision therein as follows:

"That no contracts for the armor for any vessels authorized by this act shall be made at an average rate exceeding $300 per ton of 2,240 pounds, including royalties, and in no case shall a contract be made for the construction of the hull of any vessel authorized by this act until a contract has been made for the armor of such vessel."

Your committee recommend that this restriction be removed and that contracts be authorized so that the construction of the hulls of these vessels may go on without further delay.

NAVAL PROGRAMME.

For the purpose of increasing the naval establishment of the United States the committee recommend that the President be authorized to have built by contract two seagoing coast-line battle ships, carrying the heaviest armor and most powerful ordnance for vessels of their class upon a trial displacement of about 13,500 tons, and to have the highest practicable speed and great radius of action, and to cost, exclusive of armor and armament, not exceeding $3,600,000 each; three armored cruisers of about 13,000 tons trial displacement, carrying the heaviest armor and most powerful ordnance for vessels of their class, and to have the highest practicable speed and great radius of action, and to cost, exclusive of armor and armament, not exceeding $4,250,000 each, and three protected cruisers of about 8,000 tons trial displacement, carrying the most powerful ordnance for vessels of their class, and to have the highest speed compatible with good cruising qualities and great radius of action, and to cost, exclusive of armament, not exceeding $2,800,000 each.

The maximum cost of the ships herein authorized, exclusive of armor and armament, will be $28,350,000. This is the largest naval programme ever submitted by the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House and is in accord with the wishes and recommendations of the Secretary of the Navy and Admiral Dewey and will, we believe, meet the just demands of public sentiment. The past year in naval construction has been marked by the most liberal naval programmes on the part of all foreign nations. At the present time there is pending in the Reichstag of Germany a naval bill which, if passed, will increase the tonnage of the present German navy 422,000 tons, a larger tonnage than that of her present navy.

In the apt words of our able Secretary of the Navy—

"Not only is the importance of sea power recognized in our own country, but it is recognized abroad. If you are simply going to keep pace with other nations you will recognize the importance of an immense naval increase. * * * The public mind expects that you will do something toward giving us a navy commensurate with the present and increasing needs of the country."

OUR PRESENT NAVY.

Our Navy at the present time, including all ships authorized as well as those under construction, will be seen by the following table:

Summary showing the number of vessels in the United States Navy.

REGULAR NAVY.

First-class battle ships	15
Second-class battle ship	1
Armored cruisers	5
Armored ram	1
Steel single-turret monitors	4
Double-turreted monitors	6
Iron single-turret monitors	9
Protected cruisers	21
Unprotected cruisers	4
Gunboats	12
Light-draft gunboats	3
Composite gunboats	6
Training ship (Naval Academy)	1
Special class	2
Gunboats under 500 tons	19
Torpedo-boat destroyers	16
Steel torpedo boats	36
Submarine torpedo boat	1
Wooden torpedo boat	1
Iron cruising vessels	5
Wooden cruising vessels	7
Sailing vessels, wooden	6
Tugs	17
Wooden steam vessels unfit for sea service	11
Wooden sailing vessels unfit for sea service	6
Total number of vessels in Regular Navy	215

Of these we have recovered and added to the Navy the following vessels, which were sunk during the war with Spain:

Name.	Type.	Name.	Type.
Reina Mercedes	Cruiser.	Isla de Cuba	Gunboat.
Don Juan de Austria	Gunboat.	Isla de Luzon	Do.

AUXILIARY NAVY.

Merchant vessels converted into auxiliary cruisers	7
Converted yachts	25
Converted tugs	27
Steamers converted into colliers	17
Special class	12
Total number of vessels in Auxiliary Navy	88
Grand total	303

The names, types, size, speed, batteries, and armor of the vessels will be more clearly understood by an examination of the table hereinafter annexed:

Our Navy to-day ranks fourth among the navies of the world—England first, France second, Russia third, United States fourth, and Germany fifth. We are ahead of Germany to-day only by 2,720 tons—a cruiser about the size of the Atlanta.

In view of the fact that seventeen years ago, when we started in to build up a new navy, our rank was that of twentieth, and that to-day we stand fourth, no one will dispute but that in the intervening years we have made magnificent progress.

THE COST OF OUR NEW NAVY.

The cost of our Navy, as shown by table hereinafter annexed, from the time we authorized its first vessels—the Atlanta, Boston, Chicago, and Dolphin—on March 3, 1883, including vessels authorized and under construction, is as follows:

Actual cost of finished vessels	$98,529,511.85
Estimated final cost of vessels now in course of construction	62,570,610.23
Total	161,100,122.08

And the Secretary of the Navy in his report says:

"The total for finished vessels of $98,529,511.85 and the estimated total for unfinished vessels of $62,570,610.23 make not a large amount comparatively in view of the result, which is a new navy of efficient and powerful vessels prepared for the emergencies of national defense. It is hardly more than the sum paid in a single year for pensions to the soldiers and sailors who served a generation ago in the late civil war."

OUR NAVAL POLICY.

It will be seen from an investigation of the following table, showing the amounts carried by the annual naval appropriation acts from 1883 down to the present time, that our policy has been to gradually build up the Navy year by year. Each naval appropriation act has usually been marked by a considerable increase in the amount of appropriations over that of the preceding year, and also in the number of new ships. During the last few years the increased number of ships has been larger, owing to the recognized growing importance of sea power the world over.

Amounts carried by the naval appropriation bills since 1883.

	Appropriation.
1883	$14,819,976.80
1884	15,894,434.23
1885	14,980,472.59
1886	15,070,897.95
1887	16,489,907.20
1888	25,767,348.19
1889	19,942,835.35
1890	21,692,510.27
1891	24,136,035.53
1892	32,541,654.78
1893	23,543,385.00
1894	22,104,061.38
1895	25,327,126.72
1896	29,416,245.31
1897	30,562,660.95
1898	33,003,234.19
1899	56,098,783.68
1900	48,099,969.58

It may be said that the country has been fortunate in having men at the head of the naval administration who have given direction and made wise recommendations in building up the new navy. The first authorization for new ships was during the administration of Secretary Chandler. Under Whitney the first battle ships, the Maine and Texas, called second-class battle ships, also some of the large cruisers and monitors, were authorized. Under Tracy we commenced to build first-class battle ships, the Indiana, Massachusetts, Iowa, and Oregon, as well as cruisers.

Under Herbert there was authorized a number of torpedo boats and gunboats, as well as the construction of more battle ships. Under Long we have authorized and are building battle ships, cruisers, monitors, gunboats, torpedo boats, and torpedo-boat destroyers, as well as building dry docks and making improvements in the navy-yards necessary to the proper maintenance of our naval establishment. We have a navy to-day which includes a considerable number of vessels of every class, and ship for ship it will equal that of any navy in the world.

Seventeen years ago we had practically no facilities for building ships, and what we had were discredited. We were obliged to buy our armament and armor, and even in one case our plans, from foreign countries. To day we are not only building ships in American shipyards, of American material, by American labor, on American plans for ourselves, but also for some of the leading nations of the world. Such has been the advance which has been made in naval progress in our own country.

The question may be asked, What shall be our future naval policy?

Let us build as we have been building—gradually, on broad lines and upon the most advanced ideas of naval construction; not so fast that we will be ahead of the advance of naval progress, but slow enough to secure all the benefits of new improvements and new inventions; or, better still, to do as the American Navy has always done, when given an opportunity, to lead the march of the best naval construction, which it demonstrated its ability to do on at least one memorable occasion in American history—when the little "cheese box of Ericsson" in that great contest with the Merrimac blazed the pathway for the mighty battle ship of to-day.

THE PRINCIPAL NAVIES.

The following data are taken from a British parliamentary paper entitled "Return, showing the fleets of Great Britain, France, Russia, Germany, Italy, United States of America, and Japan, distinguishing: Battle ships, built and building: cruisers, built and building; coast-defense vessels, built and building; torpedo vessels, torpedo-boat destroyers, and torpedo boats, built and building," which, as therein stated, is compiled from the "official list of each navy," and has been supplemented by some fuller and later data on hand in the Office of Naval Intelligence (United States). It is therefore correct.

It must be clearly borne in mind that there are in every navy certain classes of vessels which appear in the official navy list, but which can not be considered as forming part of that navy's fighting force.

These are:

(a) Obsolete ships;
(b) Receiving ships;
(c) Sailing and training ships, brigs, etc.;
(d) Tugs and miscellaneous.

All these classes are omitted from the tonnage given below.

Neither are there included in these data any auxiliary vessels, such as yachts or merchant vessels, for it would mean practically the addition of the merchant marine of the several countries, all of which is available.

The table and diagram give tonnage, then, only of vessels actually constructed for war purposes.

Fig. I. Table I.

This second table (construction since 1890) was felt necessary for two reasons:

(1) It eliminates all obsolete vessels and makes a comparison of modern construction possible;

(2) It also gives the construction of the several countries from a date which marks the intense revival of naval construction everywhere.

From these tables the position occupied by the United States is fourth, with Germany a very close fifth. But this close relative position is not likely to be long occupied by these two countries, because there is included in the tonnage of the United States 23,000 tons of old monitors, which should be removed as useless.

Also, Germany has incalculable advantage of a definite building programme, which is given on page 26. From this it is seen that Germany will certainly construct as new tonnage the following:

	Tons.
13 battle ships of 11,000 tons	143,000
9 battle ships of 11,000 tons to replace old	99,000
8 battle ships of 11,000 tons to replace old	88,000
9 large cruisers of 5,500 tons, new tonnage	49,500
16 small cruisers of 2,000 tons, new tonnage	32,000
30 torpedo-boat destroyers of 350 tons, new tonnage	10,500
Total	422,000

This construction is only such as is to be provided for by the naval programme of this year. Should any excitement or threat of war arise, the additions to this programme can not be estimated. And the advantage in time and efficiency of ship construction that will result from such a programme must always be kept in mind. Every ship built improves the facilities for the construction of the next one.

The average tonnage is obtained by dividing the total tonnage by the number of vessels. In the case of England and the United States the large average is due to the relatively small number of torpedo vessels.

The position of Italy is sixth, with Japan a pressing rival; for, on carefully examining the table of construction since 1890, we find that Japan is much ahead of Italy, and the construction in the last ten years is practically the available force in case of emergency. This is a good illustration of the fact that "tonnage" is by no means a definite measure of strength, as out of 148,588 tons of Italian B. S., 108,189 tons were constructed between 1863 and 1888, the older vessels are obsolete, and the later so nearly so that they are being tinkered with and remodeled, at enormous expense and with entirely unsatisfactory results. The compact, homogeneous Japanese fleet of battle ships would doubtless be superior.

Fig. II

This figure gives the construction for each year from 1890 to 1900, inclusive. It is almost impossible to obtain the data for ships "laid down" each year, for in so many cases, especially France and Italy, the delay in actually laying the keel after the order has been given frequently amounts to several years. The data concerning "vessels launched" are more definite, and Table II has been constructed accordingly from the data on vessels launched.

In the case of the year 1900 the data mean vessels building and not yet launched, a portion of which will be launched in 1900 and others laid down. For purposes of comparison the plan adopted is believed to be the better.

Table I gives in tabular form the tonnage of vessels of each class: (a) built, (b) building, and (c) built since 1890. This table is but Fig. II amplified.

The Germany navy in 1916 will be about as given on page 27. All these vessels are to be vessels available for "active service." Now, rule 2 of the German shipbuilding law of 1898 provides for substitute vessels as follows:

Battle ships and armored coast-defense vessels must be replaced after twenty-five years.

Large cruisers after twenty years.

Small cruisers after fifteen years.

These periods run from the year in which the first installment of the displaced vessel is paid to the time of the first payment of the substitute vessel.

Germany has four vessels of the Sachsen class, built in 1877 and 1878 and remodeled in 1894-95; the Oldenburg, a very old vessel; six of the Siegfried class, 1889-1892; two of the Odin class; the Kaiser and Deutschland of 1875; all of which are to be replaced by first-class battle ships, and the four vessels of the Wörth class of 1891-92, which also will have to be replaced. In the cruiser class there are a number of vessels built between 1889 and 1897 which will similarly be replaced. Hence, to complete the programme of 1916 more vessels will be constructed than appears by a mere examination of the table.

B. S.—Battle ships, i. e., vessels usually of large tonnage (the present practice giving between 10,500 and 15,000 tons), with maximum offense and defense; protection to hull by vertical side armor; protective deck; coal bunkers and cellulose; guns protected by barbettes, turrets, casemates, and shields.

Ar. Cr. = Armored cruisers, i. e., vessels of moderate to large tonnage, with protection to hull and battery similar to that of battle ships, except that the thickness of metal in all cases is much less, which with the weight saved by carrying lighter guns gives opportunity to make the speed and steaming radius of the armored cruiser much greater than the battle ship.

Pr. Cr. = Protected cruisers, i. e., vessels usually of small to moderate tonnage, with protection to hull by protective deck, coal bunkers, and cellulose. No side armor. No turrets or barbettes or casemates; guns protected by gun shields.

Unpr. Cr. = Unprotected cruisers, i. e., vessels without any of the protection of the above classes. It will be noticed that no country has constructed a vessel of this class for many years.

C. D. = Coast defense, i. e., vessels with many of the characteristics of B. S. in having thick armor for hull and battery protection; large guns; small speed; limited coal supply, which means small steaming radius. Usually these vessels have low free-board and are not good seagoing vessels.

Especial attention is invited to the fact that no country, except the United States and Russia, has constructed such a vessel for many years. This point is regarded as very important in estimating the naval strength of the several powers.

The expression "coast defense" as applied to ships is almost unknown abroad. It appears in the United States in the construction of the monitor class and in France in the furor with which the construction of submarine boats is undertaken.

A study of the policy of the real maritime nations—England and Germany—shows that the defense is always to be offense. Both these countries are building only seagoing battle ships, large cruisers, and all torpedo boat construction has been abandoned for the construction of torpedo boat destroyers.

Torp. Vss. = Torpedo vessels, a class, 700 to 1,000 tons, which experience has shown to have neither the merits of gunboats nor of sufficient speed to catch torpedo boats; and therefore construction of this class has ceased.

T. B. D. = Torpedo-boat destroyers, vessels of 300 to 400 tons, strong construction good seagoing qualities, very high speed, and large steaming radius.

T. B. = Torpedo boats, vessels from 30 to 200 tons, no longer being built in England or Germany, which, as above stated, are building only the destroyer.

The above explanation is considered necessary to an understanding of naval strength.

MEMORANDUM OF INFORMATION FOR HON. GEORGE EDMUND FOSS, ACTING CHAIRMAN OF NAVAL COMMITTEE, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The accompanying memorandum, prepared for transmittal to Hon. GEORGE EDMUND FOSS, acting chairman of the Naval Committee, House of Representatives, is in response to a request addressed by him to the Chief Intelligence Officer on February 23, 1900.

The present statement of the comparative strength of the principal navies supplements one of February 17, 1900 (O. N. L., 1172). The earlier statement was based upon tonnage; the present one is based upon the number of ships of the various types in the principal navies.

The diagram which follows shows graphically the number of vessels of the several classes for seven countries; the armored cruisers, protected cruisers, unprotected cruisers, and torpedo vessels are grouped into two general classes, called cruisers and gunboats, all above 2,000 tons being cruisers, and from 2,000 to 400 tons gunboats.

The tabular statement gives vessels built and actually under construction; the diagram presents the same information graphically.

FOREIGN NAVAL PROGRAMMES.

ENGLAND.

A yearly programme in accordance with a carefully devised plan for the construction of a homogeneous fleet. Parliament and the nation have long accepted the principle that her naval strength must be equal in numbers and superior in power to that of the two strongest navies in the world, and the British estimates, which include the naval programme, are framed on this principle.

During the present fiscal year it was proposed to lay down—
Two battle ships (design not decided).
Two armored cruisers, 9,800 tons each.
Three small cruisers (design not decided).
Two gunboats.
Two first class torpedo boats.

FRANCE.

A shipbuilding programme drawn up in 1891, modified in 1896, covering a period extending to 1907, provided for the construction of 204 ships. Owing to recent events and the disorganized state of French finances, this programme has been practically abandoned after being about half carried out.

France is at present without a definite policy beyond finishing the ships already in hand. The minister of marine proposes a building programme which will supply the number of vessels necessary to make the French navy a homogeneous force. This programme comprises the laying down, beginning this year, of the following vessels:
Six battle ships of 14,865 tons each.
Five armored cruisers of 12,600 tons each.
Twenty-eight torpedo destroyers.
One hundred and twelve torpedo boats.
Twenty-six submarine boats.

These 177 units will cost 476,000,000 francs, and are to be completed by 1907. A further sum of 235,000,000 francs is to be added to complete the ships now building, which will be finished by 1903, so that, up to 1907, France proposes to spend 711,000,000 francs in the construction of her fleet.

GERMANY.

In 1898 a shipbuilding programme, known as the "Sexennate law," provided for a definite yearly increase of the German navy up to 1904. The Emperor, is actively agitating the subject of a further increase, and a new programme, which practically doubles the fleet, is now before the Reichstag, which will probably be adopted.

According to this programme the following table shows the present strength and as projected in 1916:

	1900.	1916.
Battle ships	17	40
Armored ships	8	8
Large cruisers	11	20
Small cruisers	27	48
Gunboats	5
Torpedo boats	84	114
Total	152	230

ITALY.

Programme of 1899-1904. The purpose of the Government is to expedite the ships in hand in such a way that they may be completed within four years, together with two new battle ships to be laid down. Under existing conditions a period of six years will be required to complete the seven ships now building, and to augment the credits in the present financial state of the country is declared to be impossible. In order that the work may go on it is proposed that the treasury shall advance money to the navy, to be repaid in installments out of the money voted for naval purposes up to the year 1905. In this way the Italian fleet would possess in July, 1904, 21 battle ships fully completed.

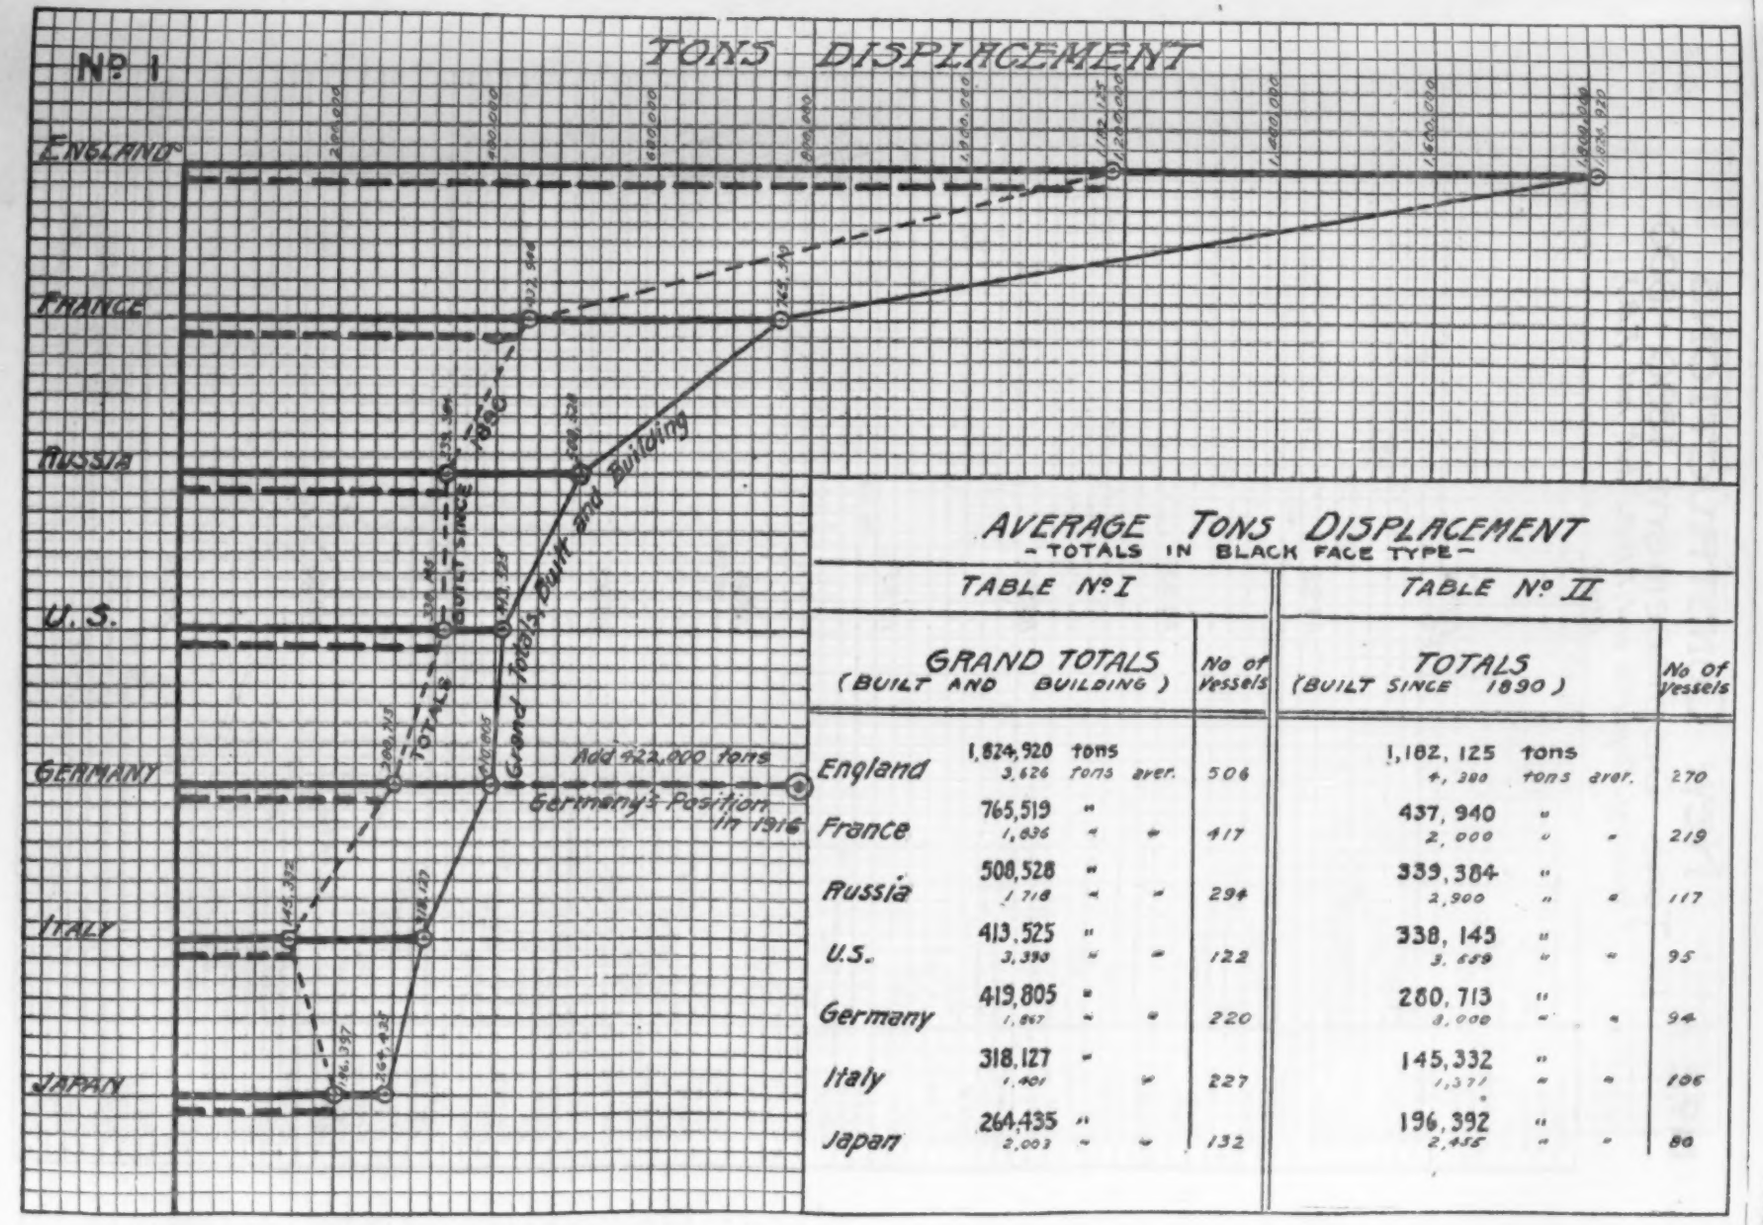
JAPAN.

The naval programme of 1895 of new construction is to be completed by April 1, 1903. By 1901 there are to be 54 ships in readiness; by 1903, 69 more; or a total of 117 war ships. These are divided as follows:
Four battle ships.
Four first-class armored cruisers.
Three second-class armored cruisers.
Two third-class armored cruisers.
Fifteen torpedo cruisers.
Eighty-nine torpedo boats.
All these vessels are at present either completed or in process of construction.

RUSSIA.

According to the Russian programme the expenditure for new construction for the seven years 1898-1904 is placed at 157,000,000 roubles (about $81,000,000).

UNITED STATES.



The act of Congress making appropriation for increase of the Navy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, provided for the construction of three seagoing coast-line battle ships, sheathed and coppered; three armored cruisers, sheathed and coppered, and six protected cruisers, sheathed and coppered.

Expenditure on new construction for five years.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Chairman, I would be untrue to myself if I did not congratulate the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Foss] who has just taken his seat upon the masterful showing which he has made in his report, and upon the conclusion of the arduous labors in committee that have accompanied the birth of this bill. That the committee itself did not come to a unanimous agreement is to me a matter of regret. I myself agree in some things with the minority and agree in others with the majority. But I believed it to be my duty, if I had any fight to make, to make it upon the floor of this House, as I have heretofore done, and I declined to sign the minority report.

Mr. Chairman, the past shows that a powerful navy for the American nation is a vital necessity. Without it we may become the prey of the robber nations of the earth; without a great navy, I will undertake to say, we to-day might be at war with Great Britain over the Alaska boundary. Her rapacity toward the Boers is due to her greed for gold; and there is as much gold in Alaska as in the Transvaal. It is the fact that we are prepared for war that saves us from trouble with the powers of Europe. From the days of the battle of Salamis down to the present a strong navy has been the safety of a maritime nation. It was the battle of Salamis that drove Xerxes from Greece, not the fight at the pass of Thermopylæ. It was the battle in the bay that sent him whirling back across the Hellespont into Asia, where he belonged.

When Hannibal invaded Italy and maintained himself there for seventeen years without reenforcement, it was not the Roman legions that drove him to Africa; it was the Roman ships which conveyed Scipio's army there and forced Hannibal to follow it in a vain effort to defend Carthage. It was the navy that made Venice the supreme mistress of the commerce of the world for centuries. The Mediterranean Sea was practically a Venetian lake, because of the Venetian navy. It was her navy that afterwards made Holland the mistress of the sea. And it was not until the English navy had been built to proper proportions that Von Tromp was compelled to pull down his broom and acknowledge its supremacy. It was our Navy that won the most brilliant victory in the Revolution. Admiral Paul Jones in his fight with the Serapis and the Countess of Scarborough gave the Revolution an impetus that put behind our forefathers not only the sympathy of Europe, but substantial aid in the way of dollars and of French battle ships.

Paul Jones, an American admiral, was the only man in either Army or Navy who had invaded England since the days of the battle of Hastings. The whole British coast was in alarm. He landed at different places, and drew in plunder the same as the English themselves drew it in when they sacked the city of Pekin.

It was by the aid of the French navy that we achieved the final triumph of the American Revolution—the surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown. Without the activity of the French fleet under the Count de Grasse, Cornwallis would have escaped. A British fleet was hastening to his succor; but when its commander learned that a French fleet of superior force was already in the Chesapeake, it turned back to New York.

It was Nelson, and not Wellington, who was the leading factor in the downfall of Napoleon. The victories of the British navy at Aboukir, Copenhagen, Cape St. Vincent, and Trafalgar destroyed all his hopes. France was practically cut off from the rest of the world. Her commerce was utterly ruined, and she was compelled to feed upon herself until her resources were exhausted.

It was the American Navy that gave us peace in the treaty of Ghent in the war of 1812. Hull had surrendered an American army at Detroit. Commodore Perry, within 100 miles of that city, demolished a British fleet—the first time that American vessels had met an English fleet—and sent to Washington the immortal dispatch, "We have met the enemy, and they are ours." [Applause.]

Scott had been driven back at Niagara and Lundy's Lane; Wilkinson had made a fiasco on the northern border; but the guns of the American Navy were heard on Lake Champlain, where Commodore McDonough sent the English fleet to the bottom. [Applause.]

Washington, your own proud capital, had been captured by the British, and this building burned, our monuments defaced, the White House destroyed, your President became a fugitive in the forests of Virginia: but the victories of Decatur, of Commodore Stewart, of Bainbridge, and of old Isaac Hull in the Constitution were a sufficient recompense for the destruction of the city of Washington. [Applause.] In only one instance in that war did the army achieve a victory, and that was at the Saranac, for the battle of New Orleans, it will be remembered, was fought long after the treaty of peace was signed.

The total destruction of the Turkish navy by the allied fleets at Navarino rescued Greece from the clutches of the followers of the Prophet and restored to her her freedom.

It was the American Navy that gave us the victory in the war with Mexico. Taylor had marched across the Nueces, across the Colorado, across the Rio Grande; he had taken Monterey; he had reached the plains of Buena Vista and wiped out Santa Anna's army; but it was Scott who went to the city of Mexico through the aid of the American Navy, which bombarded the castle of San Juan de Ulloa and gave him a landing place at Vera Cruz. [Applause.]

It was the American Navy that sounded the knell of doom for the Confederacy when gallant old Farragut broke the iron barrier, passed the forts of Jackson and St. Philip, and captured the city of New Orleans. And it was all done before McClellan left the Peninsula. The Confederacy was split in twain when the Mississippi was opened. The fate of the Confederacy was sealed the instant the ports of the South were declared under blockade by President Lincoln. If the Confederacy had had a navy, and if things had been more equal both on sea and on land, we would have had two nations in existence to-day where there is only one.

It was the Navy, I may add, that won the Spanish war. I believe that if Schley and Sampson had been left to their own inspiration, or had received the orders that Dewey received, they would have gone into Santiago Harbor without sending an army down there to storm San Juan and El Caney.

It was the Navy, under Dewey, that destroyed the Spanish fleet and won the empire in the East; and it was the Navy that finally brought proud Spain to her knees with her hands held upward, acknowledging her subjugation. [Applause.]

So, Mr. Chairman, I say that the Navy is a vital necessity to the United States as well as to all other maritime nations. This vital necessity is recognized by the people of the country—North and South, East and West. The people to-day are clamoring for an increase of the Navy because they know its usefulness, because they know it is a never-failing defender, because they know it is a never-failing aggressor, when war breaks out. In a multiplicity of ships there is safety.

Now, what have we done, and what are we doing, to carry out the wishes of the people? We have three battle ships on the stocks, and no method of procuring armor for them. We have three more battle ships and three armored cruisers authorized, and a string attached to each in the shape of a provision that they shall not be even contracted for unless the best armor manufactured can be obtained at $300 a ton. We propose to authorize in this bill the building of two more battle ships, three more armored cruisers, and three protected cruisers. Shall there be a string attached to them also? Can men face their constituents after authorizing the construction of these battle ships and cruisers, and then refusing to provide the money for furnishing the armor for them? Why, sir, it seems to me like voting for a declaration of war and refusing the funds necessary to carry on the war. I believe that the people demand to-day not only the prompt construction of the ships already authorized but also the construction of as many more vessels.

For nearly five years have some of these ships remained without armor. I well remember speeches on this floor in which we were told that we could get armor for $200 a ton. Very well; we tried it. No ships were built. The man wanted a twenty-year contract, with a pledge that a fleet of ships should be built each year, and went back on his promise; he could not furnish armor at $200 a ton. Then we reached a point where, after authorizing the construction of ships, we attached a string to the authorization in another manner—this was June 10, 1896:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby directed to examine into the actual cost of armor plate and the price for the same which should be equitably paid, and shall report the result of his investigation to Congress at its next session, at a date not later than January 1, 1897; and no contract for armor plate for the vessels authorized by this act shall be made until such report is made to Congress.

That was the condition then, and a similar condition exists to-day. The ships are authorized by you, and then you attach a string and by pulling it get no ships at all. The ships are still unbuilt. We have gone through a war since then, and not one of these ships was built before war was declared, and not one was available during the war. [Applause.]

Mr. RIDGELY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CUMMINGS. Oh, yes, with pleasure.

Mr. RIDGELY. Did we not at a later date legislate on this matter of the price of the armor plate for our naval increase?

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Chairman, at the next session of Congress you provided that the price should not exceed $400 per ton for armor inferior to the Krupp armor, but at the last session of Congress you provided that superior armor should not be obtained unless it could be had at $300 a ton—an impossible price. If you pay $400 a ton for the old harveyized armor, certainly the new Krupp armor is worth at least as much, and yet you limited the price to $300 a ton. In other words, you provide that the best armor shall be furnished at $100 per ton less than the sum you have expressed yourselves willing to pay for inferior armor. You practically determined, as I said before, that you would authorize the ships, but you took special care to prevent the building of them. [Applause.]

Mr. RIDGELY. In view of the statement of the gentleman as to the armor heretofore provided, which has been termed "rotten," is it not about time that the Government should undertake to make its own armor and prevent that abuse to which the gentleman has referred?

Mr. CUMMINGS. Why did you vote to put the price of this "rotten armor" at $400 a ton——

Mr. RIDGELY (interrupting). It was not done by my vote. The question I have asked the gentleman is, if he does not think it about time that we make our own armor?

Mr. CUMMINGS. I think that it is time, Mr. Chairman, that this country understood that the lives of its sailors, its marines, and others connected with the naval service have been endangered and menaced when this Government found itself involved in war by the action of Congress in regard to this question of armor plate. [Applause.] I say that the men who fought with Dewey at Manila and with Schley at Santiago are entitled to the best protection the Government can give, by placing the best armor on its battle ships that can be made, by metallic furniture, and by all other life-saving devices.

Mr. RIDGELY. And is not the best protection possible guaranteed by making our own armor at home, by our own Government, and under our own supervision, to the end that no contractor be allowed to impose on us?

Mr. CUMMINGS (continuing). We authorize two battle ships here to-day, and six cruisers, and here is the same old story and the same old string over and over again. We will not contract for them, gentlemen say, until we build an armor-plate factory and can manufacture the armor for them ourselves. We will delay the construction three years more, taking in the three battle ships and three cruisers authorized in the last session, and the three battle ships under contract, authorized in the first session of the Fifty-fifth Congress, thus making a total delay of eight years in the construction of some of these ships. On the score of alleged economy you are opposing expenditure that the world recognizes as an absolute necessity. [Applause.]

Mr. RIDGELY. Does not the gentleman think it will be better to have even some little delay than to authorize the continuous purchase of the rotten armor which endangers the lives of our seamen and officers and adds no credit to our Navy, but squanders the people's money?

Mr. CUMMINGS. Ah, Mr. Chairman, this is not the rotten armor. The gentleman is mistaken in that. It is the Krupp armor to which I have referred. It has been approved by the Navy Department after the most careful tests. It is an armor that is subjected to seven different treatments before its completion, and not heated once or twice, as was the case with the old harveyized armor. It is one-third lighter than the harveyized armor, with an equal power of resistance. The world has moved. There has been some progress in armor-plate making, as the gentleman will learn if he examines the subject carefully. The hardening process in the harveyized plate did not—could not—extend more than an inch below the surface, no matter how thick the plate. In this Krupp armor the hardening process penetrates the plate one-third of its thickness. It is of a fibrous nature where it is not hardened, while the other is granulated. There is as much difference between them as there is between paper and sheet iron.

Mr. RIDGELY. Have we ever had any evidence of fraud demonstrated by turning in armor for our battle ships that was not up to the standard?

Mr. CUMMINGS. Now, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the gentleman is circling around in the same groove. [Laughter.] He comes back to the point he started from. I have stated that the armor provided here is not the old harveyized armor which was at one time found to be defective, but an armor of entirely different material.

Mr. RIDGELY. I have been suggesting my inquiries to the gentleman in all courtesy to him. My point is that we are liable to have frauds committed upon us as long as we are willing to accept the armor plate manufactured by outsiders. Their object is simply to swell their profits; my plan is to make the armor ourselves and save this exorbitant cost and enjoy the knowledge that we are doing the very best we can for the Government and for the people.

Mr. CUMMINGS. And I have answered the gentleman in the same spirit. I have answered the point he is making. His suggestion for a Government plant, if carried out, would involve a long delay and the presence of a score of naval inspectors in each factory to watch the progress of this work, after it is constructed.

Mr. RIDGELY. Is that not true now, as far as the inspection is concerned?

Mr. CUMMINGS. Ah, there is an inspection, of course. But there are only one or two inspectors in each factory. It would require a dozen or twenty in a Government manufactory. Now, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. GAINES and Mr. GRIFFITH rose.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Now, Mr. Chairman, I am perfectly willing to stand here by the hour answering questions if they are pat. I will yield to my distinguished friend from Nashville.

Mr. GAINES. The same men who made the rotten armor plate, which you reported should be condemned, are to make the Krupp armor plate, are they not?

Mr. CUMMINGS. I know nothing whatever concerning that; but if it is made, and made cheaper than any nation in Europe pays for it, and the Government inspectors do their duty, we shall have done our duty to the men behind the guns when our battle ships and armored cruisers are engaged with the enemy.

Mr. GAINES. The fact is that the same company that owns the Krupp process and is to make this armor plate is composed of the same men who made the rotten armor plate which you condemned in a report to the Fifty-third Congress.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Oh, no; the Bethlehem Company own the Krupp process as well as the Carnegie Company.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. And that process has been tested again and again.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Yes. And Congress has been paying willingly $400 a ton for the inferior armor, and now it is proposed to limit the Krupp armor to $300 per ton.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I disagreed with the policy of the Naval Committee in some respects, but I propose to stand by it as far as my conscience will allow.

I disagreed with the committee when they refused to provide for the building of gunboats. The Secretary of the Navy had asked for the construction of 13 gunboats. When Admiral Dewey came before the committee he testified that he thought he would rather have battle ships than gunboats. We had captured four Spanish gunboats when Manila was taken—that is, Dewey had raised the wrecks. Since then we have bought a lot of little gunboats—some not as large as canal boats—from the Spanish Government. Admiral Dewey, while before the committee, said he thought we did not want any more gunboats, and he would take two or three battle ships in the place of them. Well, the committee gave him two battle ships, although the Secretary had not asked for them; but while Secretary Long was before the committee he said he would have asked for them if he had thought he could get them.

Now, I believe in gunboats. I think that boats the size of the Helena and vessels of that class are the very thing that the nation needs. We must continue a protectorate over Cuba at least until they form a government, and it looks to me now as though they would not be able to form one for the next five years, and we must have ships for service on the coast of Porto Rico and among the islands of Hawaii. There is nothing so useful in such waters as gunboats. We certainly need them for the Philippines. Those bought and captured from the Spaniards may suffice for the present, as Admiral Dewey suggests. I am in favor of keeping these gunboats in the Philippines just as long as there is a rebel in arms in those islands. [Applause.] When the islands are conquered, I am in favor of treating them exactly as we treat Cuba. They were both in rebellion against Spain, and of the two possibly the Filipinos were a little more gallant in fighting the Spaniards—at least fully as gallant as were the Cubans—and they are entitled to the same treatment. Sure it is that Aguinaldo and his Tagals supported Dewey's attack on Manila as heartily as did Garcia the assault of Shafter and Wheeler on Santiago. Gunboats are needed there and are certainly needed elsewhere. I think it unwise to lop them off entirely in view of the recommendation of Secretary Long. We ought at least to split the difference with him, and give him half of what he asked for.

I differed with the committee on the question of sheathed ships. While they took Dewey's word with regard to the battle ships and gunboats, they refused to take his word as to sheathed ships. He said that a sheathed ship would run two years and maintain her speed without docking, whereas an unsheathed ship had to be docked at least once in every nine months. He acknowledged that the Charleston was lost on a sunken reef in the Philippine Islands because she was not sheathed. When asked whether, in his opinion, she could have been saved if she had been sheathed, he replied that at that same time a British war vessel ran upon an unknown reef and was pulled off in safety because she was sheathed. That seemed to me conclusive evidence that the battle ships which we were authorizing in this bill should be sheathed.

But I compromised. We agreed to leave the matter to the Secretary of the Navy, and if the Secretary thinks it best to have them in the docks once in nine months instead of once every two years he may sit down upon the project. I am willing to trust John D. Long, and I believe the people are willing to do so.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If it was demonstrated to the satisfaction of the committee that the sheathed ships were the best, why did not the committee report that way?

Mr. CUMMINGS. Well, they did not. It was demonstrated to my satisfaction.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Why did they not?

Mr. CUMMINGS. Because we did not have the votes to carry it, and some of the gentlemen who signed the minority report did not vote for it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Have you got a proposition in here to have sheathed ships?

Mr. CUMMINGS. No, sir; I have not. I agreed to compromise, and I am man enough to stand by it. It may become an expensive compromise for the nation; but if so, the committee and John D. Long must bear the responsibility. My skirts are clear.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It seems to me that while we are spending the money to build ships it is good sense to build the very best ships that it is possible to build with the light that you have before you now.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Will my colleague permit me to make a statement?

Mr. CUMMINGS. Certainly.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. The gentleman from New York, inadvertently, no doubt, has failed to state the exact position of the committee on this question. There is a controversy in the Navy Department. The gentleman omitted to state that. There is a difference of opinion in the Department as to whether it is best to sheathe our ships or not.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I will state it now. The Navy Department is peculiarly constructed. One year its board decides it best to have sheathed ships. That was done a year or two ago. Afterwards England built some unsheathed battle ships; ships intended for use on her own coast, and not to be sent to foreign harbors. Of course, our Navy was compelled to follow the example set by England. [Laughter.] Whether the Secretary of State was consulted or not I can not say. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. HOPKINS. Does the gentleman mean to say that this new board simply followed the example of England?

Mr. CUMMINGS. The new board decided that sheathed ships were not needed. Boards are at times necessary contrivances, but not necessarily useful. Take the case of the Holland. Here was a board that were to make a report on the submarine boat Holland. Under a bill, passed by Congress two or three years ago, it was provided that so much money should be paid for a submarine boat if she fulfilled specified requirements. Well, the board tested her to see whether she did fulfill the requirements. They came back and reported that she did, but at the same time expressed the opinion that submarine boats were useless—England was not building any of them. [Laughter.] The Navy Department, however, has bought the boat, and I have had the honor of introducing a bill providing for the purchase of 20 more of them. I am strongly of the opinion that the provision ought to have been inserted in this appropriation bill, and I think those who have seen the Holland's surprising performances will agree with me. I will answer for Admiral Dewey.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does the evidence before your committee show that sheathed ships are better than unsheathed ships?

Mr. CUMMINGS. In my opinion it does.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Then there ought not be any attention paid to the board.

Mr. DAYTON. I know my friend from New York is frank enough to say that there is a vast deal of testimony in regard to that, and there is a difference of opinion on it—some just as sincere in saying that the unsheathed ship is better and a saving of expenditure, and therefore a compromise was reached, leaving it to the Navy Department to decide upon all the evidence as to what should be done.

Mr. HOPKINS and others rose.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Let me reply to my friend from West Virginia. The evidence in my opinion shows that the sheathed ship is far better, but that it does cost much more to build it.

Mr. DAYTON. My friend will allow me. All the evidence, in my judgment, leaves it exceedingly doubtful whether the sheathed ship is not better, but it is clear that it costs hundreds and hundreds of thousands of dollars more to sheath it.

Mr. HOPKINS. Now, if the gentleman from New York will allow me.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I?

Mr. HOPKINS. We will give you all the time you want.

Mr. CUMMINGS. But I agreed to give some of my time to other gentlemen.

Mr. DAYTON. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, at present, in the absence of the acting chairman, that the gentleman shall be yielded from our side any additional time he needs.

Mr. HOPKINS. Now will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. CUMMINGS. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOPKINS. As I understand the statement, it is, with this conflict of evidence as to the proper construction of the vessels, the matter is left to the Navy Department?

Mr. CUMMINGS. To the Secretary of the Navy, not the Navy Department.

Mr. HOPKINS. That is what I wanted to get at, because under the statement of the gentleman from New York we would have one class of vessels sheathed, as I understand, one year, and then the other board would decide differently on another class.

Mr. CUMMINGS. That is the difference. It all rests, however, with the Secretary. He may, and probably will, refer it to the board, but is not forced to abide by its decision.

Mr. DAYTON. Permit me to say to the gentleman that it might be a very desirable thing to have some vessels sheathed. For certain purposes, at different parts of the earth, they may be very desirable, and at others unsheathed might be desired.

Mr. CUMMINGS. That is a fact. A sheathed vessel would undoubtedly be far more useful a thousand miles from a dock than one unsheathed.

Mr. THROPP. Can you give us a statement of the cost of a sheathed vessel as against an unsheathed—that is, the increase in percentage?

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. A quarter of a million of dollars to sheathe a battle ship.

Mr. CUMMINGS. A quarter of a million of dollars to sheathe a battle ship.

Mr. THROPP. About 5 per cent.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Yes. Now, Mr. Chairman, the committee was unable to agree as to the question of building ships at the navy-yards. Well, there is a great deal to be said on both sides of this question. I thought that with three battle ships and three armored cruisers not contracted for, and with two more battle ships and six more cruisers, armored and protected, but not contracted for, we could afford at least to again try the experiment of building them in the navy-yards. It is a favorable time for doing so. The Secretary of the Navy, however, is opposed to it. He says they will cost twice as much as vessels built elsewhere and take twice the time for construction. He also thought the yards would be more or less susceptible to political influences. Possibly he is right. He undoubtedly knows far more about that than I do. I have no doubt that it will cost more to build these ships in the navy-yards than it would to build them under contract, and for this reason: The work of the Government is done under the eight-hour system; the contractors work their men from nine to ten, eleven to twelve hours. So that of necessity it must cost more to build the ships in the navy-yards than it would under contract. But I took occasion to get a statement from Captain Sigsbee concerning the construction of vessels in the English, the French, and the German navy-yards. The period covered is approximately five years for France and Germany, and a little less for England, but in all cases the period for dockyard and private construction is the same. The rate of wages was comparatively the same in both the Government and private yards. It took much longer to construct the vessels in the Government than in the private yards. I will not read the figures but will insert Captain Sigsbee's statement and figures at the close of my remarks as an appendix.

Mr. BELL. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. CUMMINGS. Yes.

Mr. BELL. I want to suggest that all the officers in the Navy Department say that they can build guns much cheaper in the navy-yards than by contract. And they have tested that. Why can not they build ships cheaper?

Mr. CUMMINGS. That does not affect my statement; I am talking about ships, and not guns. I doubt the veracity of my friend's informant, all the same. Of course every constructor in the Navy wants a job, and would be glad to see all the ships built in the navy-yards; and so would I if they could be built as cheaply. But I think some of these vessels ought to be constructed in the navy-yards, as a matter of justice to the men who work eight hours a day in those yards. Why the Government should give these men eight hours for a day's work and then take the work away from them is something I can not understand.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Does twelve hours constitute a day's work in the contract yards?

Mr. CUMMINGS. It has been so, and it may be so in some yards to-day. None of these contracting yards work eight hours a day. We passed a bill long ago making eight hours' work imperative on all contract work done for the Government——

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I am in favor of that now.

Mr. CUMMINGS (continuing). But on a ruling of the Attorney-General, or in some other way, the men failed to obtain the benefit of it. For instance, a stonecutter would hire a lot next to the Government plat, and work his men ten or twelve hours, and then take the stone over to the Government building and put it in place on the eight-hour schedule.

Mr. SIMS. Did we not pass a bill at the last Congress, which failed to go through the Senate, to correct that very evil which you refer to?

Mr. CUMMINGS. I am speaking of the one that passed both Houses long before that. I am sorry that the other did not pass the Senate. And right here I may say, Mr. Chairman, that there is an eight-hour bill now pending in the Committee on Labor, intended to correct the defects of the present law. Those opposing it have declared, if it is passed by Congress, that they will not make any bids for Government work. They declare that it would be ruinous for them to accept Government work under its provisions. If this is so, it may be necessary for the Government to have all its ships built in the Government yards.

Now, Mr. Chairman, no man can find any fault with the contract work done for the Government in the way of building ships. The contractors have been amply paid for the work, in the way of speed premiums, in addition to the contract price. But they have given us the finest ships in the world. No vessel has ever sailed the seas that could surpass the Oregon, or the Indiana, the Massachusetts, and the Iowa. If the Government can produce ships equal to them in the navy-yards, under an eight-hour schedule, and complete them as promptly, I am in favor of its doing so, if it does cost from two hundred thousand to five hundred thousand dollars more for each vessel.

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. Right on that point. Is it not true that the Government has already constructed equally good ships in the navy-yard?

Mr. CUMMINGS. The Government never constructed a battle ship.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. The Texas.

Mr. CUMMINGS. She is not a first-class battle ship, but is known as a second-class ship. Her plans were brought from England by Secretary Whitney, and they were altered in every way before she was completed.

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. She is a battle ship according to the testimony of the officers.

Mr. CUMMINGS. She is not a battle ship in the class with the Indiana, Massachusetts, and Oregon.

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. She has the best gun platform in the Navy to-day.

Mr. CUMMINGS. She ought to have something good about her, as either she or the Raleigh sank before she left her dock. Various other disasters happened to her before she became the serviceable vessel she is to-day. She did good work at Santiago.

Mr. RIDGELY. Does the gentleman from New York believe it is best for Congress to legislate so as to provide Government plants for the construction and equipment and finishing of these vessels, and also for the protection of labor?

Mr. CUMMINGS. The Government has plants already. The old Maine, the one that was blown up, and the Cincinnati were built in Brooklyn; the Texas and the Raleigh were built in Norfolk.

Mr. RIDGELY. I understood the gentleman to be arguing against the building of battle ships by the Government——

Mr. CUMMINGS. No, sir; you did not understand me correctly.

Mr. RIDGELY (continuing). Because we have to take labor at eight hours a day.

Mr. CUMMINGS. No, sir; I adduced that as an argument why we ought to build some of them in the yards. We have no right to concede our employees eight hours a day and then take the work away from them because firms who exact ten hours a day from their workmen can build them cheaper.

Mr. RIDGELY. That is what I say.

Mr. CUMMINGS. That is what I say. [Laughter.]

Mr. RIDGELY. I am in favor of that and of making armor plate too; that is my position.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Well, when you come to armor plate, we have the Indiana, the Massachusetts, the Oregon, the Iowa, the Kearsarge, and the Kentucky finished. We have the Illinois, the Alabama, and the Wisconsin nearly finished. We have the Maine, the Missouri, the Ohio, the Pennsylvania, the New Jersey, the Georgia, the West Virginia, the Nebraska, and the California unfinished. Why? Because you have refused to pass any law in this House or in the other by which armor plate can be provided for them. Six battle ships and three armored cruisers held up for want of armor, and you propose to throw eight more ships into the same category until an armor-plate factory is established. Seventeen great men-of-war authorized to be built by the vote of the very House that refuses to provide armor for them unless it can get it at half the price paid by England, France, Germany, Russia, and Japan.

Mr. RIDGELY. And because the influence of contractors has been sufficient to defeat the provisions under which we could have done this work ourselves.

Mr. CUMMINGS. And you want to delay the construction of these ships five years more until we can have an armor-plate factory built by the Government. Why, it will take you full two years to select the site alone.

Mr. RIDGELY. No, sir. I want, simultaneously with the provisions for the completion of these vessels, a provision for the construction of a Government armor-plate factory. Let us do both at once.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Why do you not have a Government tin factory, a Government nail factory, a Government ham factory? We get all these things under contract.

Mr. RIDGELY. That is the point I have been trying to get the gentleman to confess—that he is absolutely opposed to the Government building its own armor factory.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Nonsense! I confess nothing. I want these ships completed, and am not in favor of holding them up for the establishment of a Government factory as long as we can get the armor at a less price than European and Asiatic nations pay. Nine ships are already held up, some of them authorized four years ago, and it is proposed to make the number 17, all because this House will not vote money to get armor for them.

Mr. RIDGELY. And because Congress will not vote to establish a Government armor-plate factory.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I compliment the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHEELER]. He very sensibly agreed to provide armor for three of these ships at any price that the Secretary of the Navy might see fit to pay. But after that he wanted the others reserved for the building of an armor plant. While I sympathize with him in some respects, I believe that we can not construct these ships too soon.

I know—it has been demonstrated before the committee by the naval authorities in a way that cannot be revealed to the House—that if we pay $545 per ton for this Krupp armor, we are getting it lower than any nation in Europe pays to-day for the same armor. England has on the stocks under contract a vessel for the armor of which she pays $587 per ton. The Cramps are building a Russian war vessel to-day for which Russia pays $565 per ton for Krupp armor. They have built a vessel for Japan, the armor of which cost $575 per ton. The French are building a vessel for which $605 a ton is being paid. And I have the assurance of one of the officers of the Navy Department, who has had the figures before him, that Japan has paid in one instance $700 a ton for the same armor. The Krupps take out of the German Government nearly $600 per ton for their armor. Now, Mr. Chairman, as long as the United States can obtain this Krupp armor cheaper than it can be obtained in Europe, I am in favor of buying it until we even up on the Navy. Then I will talk to you about an armor-plate factory, if desirable.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. The price has been going up ever since the first discussion of this question.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Yes; it has. And I think it very likely it may reach $645 a ton if we delay these ships longer.

A MEMBER. And we are getting better armor.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Yes; armor that has no blowholes in it; no harveyized stuff, but the genuine article; something you would not be ashamed to wear yourself if you could. [Laughter.]

Mr. RIDGELY. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS] yield?

Mr. CUMMINGS. Oh, yes.

Mr. RIDGELY. I understand the gentleman's position to be that after we are fully supplied with battle ships, after we are virtually through with this great stress of construction, he will then take up and consider whether we had not better prepare ourselves for the making of this armor by the Government.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I would either build the ships we have authorized or I would stop authorizing them; one or the other.

Mr. RIDGELY. And I would authorize the building of a plant in connection with the building of the ships.

Mr. CUMMINGS. The market is being bulled all the time by the course we are pursuing.

Now, Mr. Chairman, my friend from West Virginia [Mr. DAYTON] said that the total cost of the entire Navy of the United States as it stands to-day is not more than we pay in one year for pensions. I do not know how that remark struck my friend from South Carolina [Mr. TALBERT], whom I do not see in his seat, but it struck me as a surprising statement. I do not know whether he counted in the vessels authorized or not.

Mr. DAYTON. My friend will pardon me a moment. I did not make my statement quite so broadly as the gentleman puts it. I said, "little more than." The ships authorized would be about $40,000,000 more than the annual pension bill. I hope he will permit me to say that I meant no disparagement of the pension bill, because I believe that measure to be just and right. I simply referred to it by way of illustration.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Well, if the Navy should cost double that amount and should reach a maximum where it insured the safety of the country, I would say we were getting it pretty cheap.

My friend from Illinois referred to the German navy. That navy is to-day within 2,700 tons of the strength of the American Navy, and that is what made Admiral Diedrich so cockey in the Bay of Manila. [Applause.]

The Emperor of Germany is "some pumpkins;" he "feels his oats." [Laughter.] For two years he has been struggling to surpass this country in the size of its Navy, and to-day in the German Riechstag a bill is pending, which will undoubtedly pass, doubling the size of the German navy—increasing her tonnage over 400,000 tons. I think that is a strong argument in favor of our building the ships we have already authorized as soon as possible, and of authorizing the building of as many others as we can afford to pay for.

I was not unsusceptible to the inquiry made by the chairman of the great Committee on Appropriations [Mr. CANNON] while my friend from Illinois [Mr. FOSS] was occupying the floor. He is one of the men who hold the purse strings of the nation. He takes account of stock in every session of Congress, and in view of the great volume of appropriations made at each session he wants to cut his cloth according to its length. He wants to know where "he is at," and he received the desired information, and in the same breath told you he was not opposed to your bill. [Applause.]

Nor are the people opposed to it. They will tolerate no more delay in this armor-plate matter. You can not take up a newspaper from the St. Croix to the Rio Grande or from Puget Sound to Key Biscayne Bay without finding paragraphs advocating the prompt increase of the Navy. They recognize the fact that the bombardment of New York by an enemy would entail thribble the cost of our entire Navy.

I have always advocated its increase. No man in this House rejoiced more than I rejoiced when men from the South dominated the committee, and Mr. Herbert, of Alabama, was made its chairman. Talk about politics! You should have been here in the Fifty-third Congress, when the leader of the minority, the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE], used two hours of the time of the committee in general debate, taking in forty minutes of my time, using it in denunciation of the South, charging you with being inimical to the Navy. In the twenty minutes left I demonstrated the secret of your former enmity, and prophesied a great change.

The Robeson frauds were enough to sicken every honest man of the Navy, and it was not until the advent of Secretaries Chandler and Whitney that full confidence was restored. Under Secretary Herbert's administration the prophecy was fulfilled.

Mr. GAINES. Did not Secretary Herbert recommend a Government armor-plate factory and did he not state the reason why, saying that the manufacture of armor was in the hands of a monopoly that was holding up the Government?

Mr. CUMMINGS. I do not know that he did.

Mr. GAINES. He did.

Mr. CUMMINGS. But he put in figures showing what it would cost to establish an armor-plate factory. He made no recommendation whatever in his report.

Mr. SNODGRASS. What were those figures?

Mr. GAINES. They are in his report. He said it would cost about $1,700,000.

Mr. CUMMINGS. The figures were from an English firm, and I think he said $1,700,000 or less than $2,000,000, and he also said that they could establish it in nine months, but it has since been demonstrated that no man can build an armor-plate factory under two or three years.

Mr. GAINES. But that armor-plate board had Mr. Frick before them as a witness to prove that. Mr. Frick was then a member of the Carnegie firm.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Well, when it comes to the question of proving things, Secretary Herbert proved by the Rohrer board that it cost $425 a ton, I think, to manufacture the plate of which my friend from Kansas [Mr. RIDGELY] complained so bitterly a while ago.

Mr. WATSON. If my friend will pardon me, I will say that after all his investigation and research along that line he made no recommendation whatever as to the establishment of an armor-plate factory by the Government.

Mr. CUMMINGS. That is my understanding.

Mr. GAINES. He certainly did, and told me so a few days ago personally. He makes the recommendation in his report.

Mr. DAYTON. I beg the gentleman's pardon. He will find that statement is not verified by the facts.

Mr. GAINES. It is verified by the record, and he said it was on account of being in the hands of a monopoly.

Mr. WATSON. I do not know what Mr. Herbert stated to the gentleman personally, but the record shows that no such recommendation was made, and the gentleman can not show any record that discloses any such statement on the part of Secretary Herbert.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I think the gentleman from Indiana is correct.

Mr. GAINES. It is in his report, and if you will get it you will see it.

Mr. WATSON. The gentleman from Tennessee had better get the report. I am familiar with it, and the recommendation which the gentleman speaks of is not there.

Mr. CUMMINGS. As I said before, I do not care what it costs, as long as it does not cost more than $545 per ton to supply armor for our vessels to-day. We want the vessels completed. We do not want them hung up here where nobody can reach them—hung up over the table like a mackerel in Ireland, where you can point at it, but not eat it.

If we are to have an increased navy, it is time to stop talking and begin work. Authorizing it will not build it; you must provide armor and do it promptly. Either do this or stop the authorization of vessels. Do one thing or the other. I believe that the people of the country, ten to one, demand a decrease in the Army and an increase in the Navy; and as long as I remain in this House I intend to voice that demand.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Foreign powers are doing that, are they not?

Mr. CUMMINGS. Yes: that is what foreign nations are doing. Germany is doing it, England just now is increasing her army, and at the same time utilizing her navy on land; for without the guns that were dragged toward Ladysmith and across the Modder River by English sailors, the Boers probably would have been to-day holding the Britons at bay at both Kimberley and Colenso. So that you see the navy in some cases is equally as efficient on land as on sea. And American sailors are not behind the English in this respect. Such men when on the sea are entitled to the protection of the best armor that the world can produce. To haggle about the price when it is imperatively needed is unmanly; to haggle about the price when it can be procured at a lower rate than that paid by any other nation is more than unmanly; it is little short of treason.

Mr. Chairman, I thank the committee for its kind attention and also the gentlemen of the Committee on Naval Affairs for yielding the increased time. [Applause.]

APPENDIX.

STATEMENT OF CAPTAIN SIGSBEE REGARDING THE CONSTRUCTION OF SHIPS IN FOREIGN NAVY-YARDS.

The following tables give the list and tonnage of Government ships building at Government dockyards and at private shipyards in the three principal shipbuilding countries of Europe.

The total cost is in every case taken from the official reports, and is probably correct so far as it goes. In the case of England and Germany, a ship is laid down, few modifications are made, and the construction is pushed through to completion. In the case of France, the time occupied in completion after the ship leaves the launching ways is often several years, and many changes are made, involving considerable expense; therefore it is probable that French construction costs even more than here represented.

The table of Italian construction shows that in a given time Government shipping to the amount of 353,000,000 lire was built in Government dockyards, and only 41,000,000 lire in private shipyards. It is of importance, however, in this connection to mention the fact that a period of six to ten years has elapsed between the beginning and completion of large vessels in Italian dockyards, and in striking contrast is the work done by the two private firms of Ansaldo & Co. and Orlando Bros.

In 1895 the Italian Government placed an order with the firm of Ansaldo & Co. for an armored cruiser named Garibaldi, and before she was launched the Argentine Government wished to purchase her. The Italian Government agreed to the sale on the condition that a second ship be built on the same lines and within the period fixed for the delivery of the first. The new vessel was fitted with water-tube boilers, whereby certain advantages were gained; but when this second vessel was completed the Spanish Government was allowed to purchase, and she became the Cristobal Colon. A third was laid down, rapidly completed, and again the Argentine Republic coveted her and got her, the ship being named the Pueyrredon. And now Messrs. Ansaldo have launched their fourth vessel of the same type. She continues, so far, an Italian ship, and is named the Garibaldi.

All these four vessels, it will be seen, have been floated within about four years from the beginning of the first, which is a splendid performance. In the case of the last—the fourth vessel—the keel was laid on September 21, 1898, while the launch took place on June 29 last, about nine months from the laying of the keel. The vessel was not a mere shell, either, for all the shafting was in place and finished up to the engine room. All the auxiliary engines in the engine and boiler rooms were fitted, and where possible their pipes were coupled up to them. All double-bottom pipes and valves and bilge pipes and valves were fitted in place and finished. Thus, instead of building only one ship leisurely, Messrs. Ansaldo, by arrangement with the Government, have been able to build four in about four years, representing a gross turnover of some 2,680,000 lire instead of 680,000 lire.

The Italian papers mention with considerable interest and pride that there are now five firms in Italy competing for the construction of a class of battleships of 8,000 tons displacement, now offered for bids by the Italian Government.

In the same connection, the German papers mention the fact that now there are in Germany five (formerly four) private yards prepared to build first-class battle ships, and nine (formerly six) firms prepared to build cruisers. It will be noticed that the latest battle ships are principally assigned to private yards.

In the tables the money values are given in the coin of the several countries, except in the last two tables in which, for purposes of comparison, all are reduced to United States gold.

APRIL 14, 1900.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. LOUDENSLAGER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message in writing from the President of the United States, by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

On April 7, 1900:

H. R. 153. An act granting a pension to Elizabeth Johns.

On April 9, 1900:

H. R. 7649. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to issue patent to the city of Elreno, Okla., for cemetery purposes;

H. R. 5049. An act to settle the title to real estate in the city of Santa Fe, N. Mex.;

H. R. 8463. An act ratifying an appropriation by the legislature of Oklahoma, out of the Morrill fund, for the use of the university at Langston for colored students; and

H. J. Res. 216. Joint resolution for appointment of members of Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

On April 12, 1900:

H. R. 60. An act to create the northwestern division of the Northern district of Georgia for judicial purposes, and to fix the time and place for holding court therein;

H. R. 9284. An act to attach the county of Foard, in the State of Texas, to the Fort Worth division of the northern district of Texas, and providing that all process issued against defendants residing in said county shall be returned to Fort Worth;

H. R. 7939. An act to amend an act approved June 10, 1880, governing the immediate transportation of dutiable merchandise without appraisement;

H. R. 10311. An act to authorize the Shreveport and Red River Valley Railway Company to build and maintain a railway bridge across Red River, at or near the town of Alexandria, in the Parish of Rapides, State of Louisiana;

H. R. 9713. An act permitting the building of a dam between Coon Rapids and the north limits of the city of Minneapolis, Minn., across the Mississippi River; and

H. R. 8245. An act temporarily to provide revenues and a civil government for Porto Rico, and for other purposes.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. DAYTON. Mr. Chairman, in the absence of the acting chairman [Mr. FOSS] momentarily, I want to call the attention of gentlemen who represent the minority report to the fact that substantially the arguments made by the chairman of the committee and by the ranking member on the other side have been on one side of the disputed questions here, and I submit that it is but fair and right that some one who favors the minority report should express the views of that minority following the gentleman from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS]. I see the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] here.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, though I did not intend to speak to-day, I will proceed on this bill, and if the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHEELER] comes in I shall desire to yield to him.

Mr. Chairman, advocating the views of the minority, I wish to state that if nothing but ordinary matters of appropriation were involved in this bill there would have been no views of the minority presented, but we would have contented ourselves with trying to amend the bill upon the floor. But in it are several features which we think involve matters of important public policy. One is the absence of any requirement that part of the cruisers be built in the navy-yards, and especially that the three 8,000-ton cruisers authorized by this bill be built, one at the navy-yard at Brooklyn, one at the Mare Island Yard, and one at the Norfolk Navy-Yard. We think this largely involves the question whether this Government shall ever build another ship in its own yards. The fight is on. If ever in the history of this country in the building up of its great Navy, that nearly every gentleman seems to want, any ships are to be built in Government yards, now is the time to begin their construction.

Another point of difference between the majority and the minority is on the armor-plate question. I shall discuss this at some length presently. If we are ever to escape the exorbitant prices of what we conceive to be a monopoly in the armor-plate business; if we are ever to be free from charges that vessels are being delayed on account of the lack of armor; if we are ever to allay the suspicion that the country is being grossly overcharged upon armor plate, we ought now to undertake to settle these questions. Year after year we make the fight in this House, and so far, year after year the armor-plate manufacturers have succeeded, and we who believe that the Government should begin an armor-plate factory in order to reduce the price of armor plate have been defeated.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will my colleague permit a question just there?

Mr. KITCHIN. Certainly.

Mr. HAWLEY. You desire to build a plant in order that you may reduce the cost. Suppose you had the experience in the construction of armor plate that the Government has had in so many other lines of construction; that you found it cost you more than it costs to-day to buy it. Would that affect your opinion on the question?

Mr. KITCHIN. In the first place, I do not believe that what the gentleman thinks is true is true.

Mr. HAWLEY. I have not said it is true, but I am asking you whether that would have a relation to the question.

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not feel called upon to debate every hypothetical question that may be submitted. If the gentleman has any reason to think it would cost the Government more than the Government is now paying and can state that as a fact, then I will have no hesitation in expressing my views upon it. I will even now say that if I thought we could buy plate as cheaply as we can make it after an honest and fair trial, I would favor buying it; but this I do not believe, as I shall try to show in a few moments. I favor cheaper prices for it or building a factory, because I despise extortion. Mr. Chairman, one other difference is based upon items which we consider extravagant and unwise. There are several of these items, and especially one to which I will presently call the attention of the House, and to which I hope the House will give its attention. It is the "emergency fund." For what purpose is it? No one knows; but it is to be at the disposal of the President, giving him $500,000 to expend as he may see fit in time of peace.

I will take these matters up, not as I have stated them, but in the order, as I believe, of their importance at this time.

I will first consider the armor-plate business. I am sorry I do not see my distinguished friend from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS], the first Democrat on this committee, who has just advocated in an earnestly delivered argument that the Government shall not go into the armor-plate business. This eminent gentleman, however, agrees with the views of the minority as to building some of our ships in our navy-yards.

Mr. Chairman, there have been page upon page of testimony in regard to armor plate. I take it that no man can find from Secretary Herbert's report, the most complete report on the subject ever submitted to the House, or from Admiral O'Neil's testimony before our committee, that armor plate will cost this Government anything like $545 per ton, the price the manufacturers demand for it. I have not my papers before me, as I did not expect to speak to-day, and would not have undertaken to speak except for the absence of the gentleman from Kentucky, who is rarely out of his seat. But my recollection is that the price of labor in a ton of armor plate in Secretary Herbert's report is placed at $165 per ton.

Mr. BARBER. Will the gentleman allow me a question there?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. BARBER. On the question of labor, was that for the labor and material only, or is that the total cost?

Mr. KITCHIN. That is not the total cost, according to my recollection.

Mr. BARBER. That is for what kind of armor?

Mr. KITCHIN. He was discussing the harveyized armor, as I understand.

Mr. BARBER. Was that single or double forging? This is important.

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not know, but suppose he was discussing the best armor known at that time.

I am giving the facts as I understand them. Admiral O'Neil puts the present price of labor and material at $250 per ton in some of his various illustrations.

The raw material in it rarely exceeds $20 per ton. I believe it is more than $20 per ton at the present time, but the average cost of material in a ton of armor plate is, I think, about $20 a ton for a number of years.

Mr. BARBER. Will the gentleman allow me a question right there?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BARBER. What do you mean by material?

Mr. KITCHIN. I mean the steel.

Mr. BARBER. Is it not a fact that the Rohrer board, in making the estimate which Secretary Herbert made, said the basis of material was $90 in 1896, at a time when pig iron was worth about one-half of what it is to-day?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will state to the gentleman that the Rohrer board placed the price of pig iron at $20 a ton. I have that fact here.

Mr. BARBER. What page is that?

Mr. KITCHIN. Now, Mr. Chairman, I read from page 10 of Admiral O'Neil's testimony.

If we discard, therefore, the consideration of interest charges on plant, which ex-Secretary Herbert claimed should not be considered, and on working capital, the charges against the appropriation for making armor, in the first case of 3,000 tons (the cost being on the same basis as in the preceding cases), would become—

10 per cent for deterioration of plant and its maintenance	$500,000
Cost of 3,000 tons of armor, at $273 per ton	819,000
Total	1,319,000

So Admiral O'Neil has placed it in this calculation at $273 a ton, and in that he includes labor and all material.

Now, he says this divided by 3,000 gives $439.66 per ton. Then if you make 5,000 tons instead of 3,000 tons, he says you would get it at $374 a ton instead of the $545 that the other side think a fair price. Then he says:

A more accurate estimate, in my opinion, would perhaps be—

6 per cent on plant valued at $4,000,000	$240,000
6 per cent interest on working capital of $600,000	36,000
8 per cent for deterioration and for maintenance of plant	320,000
Cost of making 3,000 tons of armor, at $250 per ton	750,000
Total	1,360,000

One million three hundred and forty-six thousand dollars divided by 3,000 equals $448.66 per ton, which does not make any allowance for royalty or for profit unless interest charges be so considered.

If 5,000 tons were manufactured, the figures on the same basis would be—

6 per cent interest on plant valued at $4,000,000	$240,000
6 per cent interest on working capital of $1,000,000	60,000
8 per cent for deterioration and for maintenance of plant	320,000
Cost of making 5,000 tons of armor, at $250 per ton	1,250,000
Total	1,870,000

One million eight hundred and seventy thousand dollars divided by 5,000 equals $374 per ton exclusive of royalty or profit as above.

If we discard interest charges on plant and on working capital, the charges for making armor on the above basis would be—

8 per cent on $4,000,000 for deterioration and maintenance of plant	$320,000
Cost of making 3,000 tons of armor, at $250 per ton	750,000
Total	1,070,000

One million and seventy thousand dollars divided by 3,000 equals $356.66 per ton.

And for 5,000 tons—

8 per cent on $4,000,000 for deterioration and maintenance of plant	$320,000
Cost of making 5,000 tons of armor, at $250	1,250,000
Total	1,570,000

One million five hundred and seventy thousand dollars divided by 5,000 equals $314 per ton.

You will notice, Mr. Chairman, that in all these interest charges for this great plant he has placed the rate at 6 per cent, while we know that the Government can get its interest charges for half that.

Mr. BARBER. Were not these estimates made on the basis of 3,000 and 5,000 tons?

Mr. KITCHIN. They are made on estimates of 3,000 and 5,000 tons.

Mr. BARBER. Is it not a fact that up to this time these armor-plate factories never received orders for more than 2,000 tons in any one year, and that they have never manufactured more than 2,000 tons in a year? That is the average up to this time. All the tonnage has been about 35,000 tons, and less than 2,000 tons have been manufactured in one year.

Mr. KITCHIN. I think the gentleman is in error. I think that each of these American factories has made more than 2,000 tons in a year, and that their capacity is much more than that. I admit that it is probably true that in some years they have made less than 2,000 tons.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I say this is the latest testimony that has been before the committee; and if we make 5,000 tons a year, we can make it for $314 a ton. Of course that would be an immense saving to the Government. That that is a reasonable proposition, I will state that we have in sight to-day, if we pass this bill as is now reported, besides that armor plate for which there is a present necessity for the three battle ships, the Maine, the Ohio, and the Missouri, an additional amount of 31,000 tons, enough to give a factory 5,000 tons a year for the next six years. And in the next six years, if gentlemen determine to increase the Navy at the rate indicated in this bill, we would have not only 5,000 tons for a long time to come, but I make the statement, which I think is true, that we will require ten or twelve thousand tons annually for the next forty years, if we try to keep up with Germany, England and all those countries who stand over the sea, side by side, with daggers drawn upon each other. If the American factories together can not supply annually more than 6,000 tons, then at last will you be driven to a Government factory.

Mr. BARBER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. BARBER. As to the basis of 5,000 tons of Krupp iron in Admiral O'Neil's testimony, does not the gentleman know, assuming the capacity of the plants to be as they are, and the cost upon which he has made the estimate, that they can manufacture, as matter of fact, from their present experience, only 2,000 tons of Krupp armor a year?

Mr. KITCHIN. You mean the Carnegie Works and the Bethlehem Works? My information is that it is 3,000 tons of Krupp armor each.

Mr. BARBER. Two thousand tons from present experience; they are only manufacturing Krupp armor.

Mr. KITCHIN. I remember asking some gentleman when the committee was down at the Bethlehem Works, and he told me that their capacity was 3,000 tons, as I recall it.

Mr. BARBER. Of harveyized iron.

Mr. KITCHIN. I understood it was the best iron. The armor involved in the report of Admiral O'Neil is the Krupp iron. Why, gentlemen, if you would go down and see one of the little armor plates—I will admit that they are both powerful and expensive—you will find here and there a piece of iron plate that will astonish you by its cost and size. It is perhaps 8 or 10 feet wide and 14 or 16 feet long and 9 or 10 or 12 inches thick, and what do you reckon it costs the Government? Twelve or fifteen thousand dollars—enough to buy a good plantation in any State in the Union.

Whenever you look at it the first thing that strikes you will be "What? Does that cost $12,000?" You can not conceive it; you can not understand it until you go down into the figures of these men who have been selling armor plate to us and other nations of the world. I believe there is a general feeling throughout the country from one end to the other that the Government is being, as it were, held up by the armor-plate factories. A piece about 20 inches each way is sold for $545.

Mr. LANDIS. May I suggest to the gentleman that diamonds not so large as that would cost more money?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; and if the gentleman is as hard put to sustain his side of this matter as to ask that question, I do not think I am called upon to answer him.

Mr. LANDIS. You are judging of value by the size; and I say that you will find diamonds not so large as that more valuable.

Mr. KITCHIN. But we will not find diamonds which men have made from rough material quite so expensive as those you wear, and but little more expensive than Krupp armor plate at present prices. Now, this is what Admiral O'Neil says, and I commend it to the gentleman from Indiana. He says:

> In my opinion, the price asked for armor plate has no very direct bearing on the cost of production. It is practically in the hands of a monopoly, which naturally desires to get as high a price for it as it can.

That is in Admiral O'Neil's testimony, showing that it is practically a monopoly. Of course they will hold us up as high as they can. Have you not heard the advocates of buying the plate from private corporations say that these factories will sell to one nation at $700 a ton, to another at $600 a ton, to another at $545 a ton? This shows to common-sense men that there is no way of estimating the true cost of the armor by any prices which they demand. That is my opinion of it.

Mr. WATSON. Will my colleague permit a question?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. WATSON. How long, in your opinion, would it be, if we should authorize a Government armor-plate factory, before we could manufacture armor plate?

Mr. KITCHIN. I think if the Secretary of the Navy is in thorough accord with the Government armor-plate factory, we could begin work in two years to make armor plate, perhaps earlier; but I am not an engineer of sufficient skill to state exactly. Much will depend upon the spirit of those charged by law with its construction.

Mr. WATSON. Would the gentleman suspend the completion of the three battle ships now ready for armor until that time?

Mr. KITCHIN. No, sir. My friend knows that in the committee (perhaps he was not present at the time) every member of the minority said that we were in favor of the Government going ahead, notwithstanding it was held up, and buying armor plate enough to complete these three ships—the Maine, Ohio, and Missouri—let the cost be whatever it might. But what I would do is to look out for the future, so that we should not be held up again.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] has an opportunity to provide for the future, and he declines to do it.

Mr WATSON. No.

Mr. KITCHIN. The same condition will confront you next year that confronts you this.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. The gentleman from North Carolina will understand that the bill originally provided that all the armor plate should be paid for at this price; that the Secretary of the Navy should be authorized to purchase all the armor plate—31,000 tons—at these prices.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman from Kentucky is correct; but this is the point I wish to impress on the gentleman from Indiana: Unless you take steps now to provide for the reduction in the general price of armor plate, year after year you will be put in the same position in which we now find ourselves in regard to these three battle ships—on the dock ready for armor plate. Then the cry will come that we must have the armor plate at once, and all will be compelled to yield to exorbitant prices for armor plate as a specific pressing necessity. That is what we want to provide against. We want to stop the conditions which will annually hold us upon this matter. Congress should act now, so that hereafter no monopoly can dictate extravagant prices upon the taxpayers of our country.

If you are determined that nothing shall ever be done to reduce the high prices of armor plate, that we shall never have a Government armor-plate factory to compete with other factories, then I ask you in the name of common candor to bring the matter to a test here, to raise no technical objections to this amendment when it shall be presented, but to settle this question fairly and squarely, so that the American people may know upon whom rests the responsibility of armor at $545 per ton.

I will read from the views of the minority, prepared with great care by the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky, to whom I have referred and who I say deserves large credit for the fight we intend to make in behalf of the people on this important question:

> Now, since this statement was made the gentleman's company has furnished the Government armor for $400 per ton.

This referred to the statement of Mr. Schwab, who was then as now with the Carnegie factory.

Mr. Schwab's testimony was:

> I have no hesitancy in saying that if you will give us 3,000 tons a year we will give you a very nice rebate in price for every ton over 3,000.

If the Government undertakes this business, it will make five or six thousand tons a year and perhaps ten or twelve thousand tons annually.

Mr. Schwab continues:

> If you will give us 3,500 tons a year we will give you a rebate of $100 a ton on every ton over 3,500, so important is this item of keeping our works occupied. We could well afford to make that reduction if we had the same quantity of armor to make that other people do.

We understand further that since this statement was made they have taken contracts at $400 a ton.

Mr. BARBER. For what kind of armor?

Mr. KITCHIN. Probably harveyized.

Mr. BARBER. But not the Krupp.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will come to your distinction presently. I think I will show that there is not all this difference between the cost of making Krupp armor and harveyized armor that the gentleman from Pennsylvania seems to think there is. But however that may be, we have here the statement that if we will give these people a contract for 3,500 tons a year, they will give us a rebate of $100 a ton on every ton over 3,500; and since that statement was made they have made this harveyized armor for us at $400 a ton. If we had given them a contract for 3,000 tons over 3,500 tons a year, they would have made it for $300 a ton, according to that statement, would they not?

Mr. BARBER. Does the gentleman want an answer?

Mr. KITCHIN. No, sir; it carries its answer on its face.

Now, as to the Krupp armor, every gentleman knows that within the last three or four years all the great armor-plate factories have improved their plants by providing labor-saving machinery, etc., and in my opinion they can to-day make Krupp armor as cheaply as they could harveyized armor five years ago.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. The gentleman will allow me to say that I am in possession of information which I am not at liberty to disclose, because the person imparting it declined to give me that privilege, showing that Krupp armor can be made for $100 a ton cheaper than harveyized.

Mr. BARBER. Let me reply to that statement.

Mr. KITCHIN. I am afraid my time will not allow me.

Mr. BARBER. The Secretary of the Navy does not admit that statement to be correct.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. He does not know anything more about this than the man in the moon.

Mr. BARBER. But he has his experts to give him information.

Mr. GAINES. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; for a moment.

Mr. GAINES. As has been stated here, Secretary Herbert recommended the building of an armor-plate factory. I read from page 86 of his report:

> I therefore recommend that if Congress shall determine by law upon any limit of price to be paid, it shall also authorize the Department to erect or buy an armor plant and a gun plant, and, if need be, to lease such plant until it can construct its own.

Mr. WATSON. I do not know that I ought to inject this controversy here; but I call attention to the use of the word "until" in the paragraph just read.

Mr. KITCHIN. I can not yield for a controversy between other gentlemen. I call attention to the fact that although gentlemen connected with the armor-plate factories were formally or informally invited to come before our committee and give us further information on these subjects—the information with which the gentleman from Pennsylvania seems to be filled—yet they did not come. They responded that they stood by their former statements, one of which I have read you from Mr. Schwab. They did not come to us and give us openly and fully the information which we desired.

Secretary Herbert believed, like thousands of other good people in this land, some of whom, I suppose, have taken as much pains in this matter as the gentleman from Pennsylvania (with all due respect to him), and the great country believes, that we are being "gouged" in this armor-plate business; and we believe that in the light of past events—events of the recent past—there is no escape from the position in which the Government is placed except by meeting these makers of armor plate boldly like men and telling them that we will no longer submit to the prices demanded by their monopoly (which Admiral O'Neil calls it), but that we will make our own plate.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. KITCHIN. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Taking advantage of your information and committee service, is it not your belief that if this Congress were to pass an amendment to this bill to the effect that the Government should establish an armor-plate factory and appropriate the money for it, unless on or before the last day of the present fiscal year the Secretary of the Navy should have received bids at a rate that we consider reasonable—is it not your opinion that we never would have to erect an armor-plate factory at all?

Mr. KITCHIN. That is my opinion, and I will state that in the views of the minority we say that we believe in buying our armor plate wherever we think we can get it at reasonable prices. We do not believe in the Government creating more offices; we do not believe in giving the Government more business to attend to; but we say that rather than to have extortion practiced upon us, we believe that, in defense of the great masses of the people who are back of us, we should resort to the building of an armor-plate factory, considering it a necessity for fair treatment.

Mr. GAINES. Will my friend yield right on that point?

Mr. KITCHIN. My time is very limited, but I will yield.

Mr. GAINES. On the question of monopoly and combination between the two companies, the Carnegie and the Bethlehem companies, Mr. Herbert says:

Here, then, we have the pregnant facts that the two companies in the United States have had a perfect understanding with each other as to what they should charge their own Government; that the five companies in France seem to have had a like understanding with each other as to what they should charge their Government; that the price of armor in France rose gradually from 1891 to 1894, as improvements were adopted, to about the same price as that which was charged by the Bethlehem and Carnegie companies to Russia in 1895, after the former company had forced its way into the European market. I am informed, upon authority which I believe to be good that about, or perhaps before, the time of the last contract of the Bethlehem Company with Russia there was a meeting in Paris of the representatives of the principal, if not all, of the armor manufacturers of Europe and America.

Mr. KITCHIN. We have in the views of the minority testimony of that character, to which I may refer later. Mr. Chairman, the minority in our views say:

We have been unable to find, after much investigation, where anyone places the labor cost in a ton of armor plate above $185.50; the decided weight of evidence puts it at $165, and much evidence entitled to weight as low as $156; the cost of the steel ingot will seldom exceed $20, which, together with the royalty (and there is grave doubt in our minds if any royalty whatever is paid; see Admiral O'Neil's testimony), make up the total cost of producing a ton of armor plate. This is, of course, from the standpoint of the purchaser, and does not take into consideration the profit of the company nor interest on the plant or wear and tear of same.

And we came to the conclusion from all we could learn that the armor plate would not cost the Government, after we get our plant in full operation and after a fair trial, more than $230 a ton. This is exclusive of interest charges and royalties.

Now, it is natural that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BARBER], the home of both these American armor-plate factories, should represent his own constituency and do all that he can fairly and squarely, as he is doing, to prevent the Government from coming in competition with his constituents. So I will state candidly that when we appeal to the House of Representatives to authorize the erection of an armor-plate factory, in case we can get no material reduction in prices, we have no good grounds to hope for the support of the gentleman from Pennsylvania or of his colleagues, although we would be glad to have it.

Mr. BARBER. You say that the estimate of the labor cost ranges from $185 down to $156 a ton?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. BARBER. Where do you get that $156 estimate?

Mr. KITCHIN. As I have stated, my distinguished colleague on this committee [Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky] carefully prepared this report; and no doubt when he comes to address you, if you will listen to him, he will give you all the information you desire.

Now, let us see about the building of ships. The question of building ships, the naval constructors seem to think, is of great importance.

Constructor Bowles, as I understand one of the best naval constructors on the pay list of the Government, is at the New York Yard, Constructor Stahl is another eminent naval constructor, now at the Norfolk Navy-Yard, Constructor Baxter is also in the front list of naval constructors——

Mr. DRIGGS. And Admiral Hichborn, Chief of the Bureau.

Mr. KITCHIN. These eminent naval constructors all say, without hesitation, that in their opinion the Government ought to have under construction at least one ship in each of the largest and best equipped navy-yards all the time. These navy-yards are designated to be the Mare Island Navy-Yard, on the Pacific coast, and the Brooklyn Navy-Yard, in New York, and the Norfolk Navy-Yard, in Virginia. One of these gentlemen said if they would today give the order for one of the 8,000-ton cruisers included in this bill to be built in the navy-yards, that he could begin the construction of it to-morrow in either the Brooklyn or Norfolk Navy-Yard. The New York or Brooklyn Navy-Yard has cost the Government and the Government now has invested in that yard more than $19,000,000. It has invested in the Norfolk Navy-Yard more than $5,000,000, and it has invested in the Mare Island Navy-Yard over $1,000,000. This very bill increases the amount for construction and repair of vessels in the navy-yards $3,000,000 over last year's bill, and yet fails to recommend the construction of a single vessel in those yards. The appropriation for this purpose was last year $3,000,000. In this bill it is $6,000,000.

Mr. DENNY. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. KITCHIN. Certainly.

Mr. DENNY. I desire to ask the gentleman whether he proposes any amendment to conform with the recommendations of the constructors?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will state in reply to the gentleman that we shall make the attempt, and we hope no points of order will be made against it, to amend this bill so as to build at least three ships—that is, to authorize the building of three ships, one each in these navy-yards which I have just named—and we shall also offer an amendment providing that if the Government can not get the armor plate that is now required at a certain price—I think, $400 per ton—in that event the Secretary of the Navy shall proceed to buy at any price the armor plate that is now needed; but if he has to buy it at a higher price than the figure which I have mentioned, or than we think is reasonable, then he shall at once proceed to construct an armor-plate factory.

Now, I have stated the amount invested in these navy-yards, and of course we have our naval officers there; but I believe I can give the House more information by reading some extracts from the testimony taken before the committee, and I take it that no man here can contradict this testimony in any case.

First, Mr. Constructor Bowles, of New York, makes this statement:

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I would like to ask a question. In your judgment—you speak of it being wise for the Government to construct ships in some yards for the advantages that will accrue—do you have any hesitancy in stating what you deem those advantages to be?

Mr. BOWLES. I endeavored to go over those advantages in the beginning, and, generally, they are these:

That it provides a means of maintaining the efficiency of the mechanical force and the machinery and plant; it renders repair work economical and rapid; it removes the tendency to increase alterations and repairs to existing vessels; it maintains a standard of workmanship with which we can require the contractors to comply, and it provides training for those who must inspect the contract work. Those are the material things for which you will pay. * * *

I will say a few words now about the general subject of building ships in the navy-yards. I recommend the building of some vessels in the important navy-yards of the United States, because I believe it to be good business; and if I owned those yards and kept them for the purposes they are now kept for, I should say that it would be a sensible thing to do to build one ship in each of the important yards all the time, simply to keep them in order and maintain a sufficient force ready for all emergencies.

Mr. METCALF. I want to ask Mr. Bowles, if he has no objection, to state what navy-yards are now ready to build ships.

Mr. BOWLES. I am familiar with the New York yard and the Norfolk yard, and I believe on this coast those two yards are ready to take up any work you see fit to give them. I do not know about the Mare Island yard of my own knowledge, but Mr. Baxter was the constructor there for a number of years, and he is fully qualified to express an opinion about it. I believe it is capable of taking up the work.

The CHAIRMAN. We are very much obliged to you, gentlemen, for your instructive statements.

I also want to quote from the statement of Constructor Stahl, now of the Norfolk Navy-Yard, and I wish gentlemen would pay attention to this for this reason——

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Will it disturb my colleague if I ask him a question?

Mr. KITCHIN. Not a bit.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Did Mr. Bowles also state in that hearing that that same degree of efficiency could be obtained if sufficient repair work was given to the navy-yard?

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not recall it, but I presume he did say that if they had sufficient repair work to occupy them all the time it could be done; and I should think myself that that would be true if you could occupy your navy-yards fully with repair work of all kinds.

Mr. DAYTON. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. KITCHIN. Certainly.

Mr. DAYTON. You will be frank enough to state that Constructor Bowles gave nine reasons for and nine reasons against, and it is a question to be determined by a man's judgment whether the nine reasons for or the nine reasons against are the stronger.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman from West Virginia can bring out the differences and develop those facts when he comes to speak; but whatever he may develop, he can not escape the conclusion that the gentleman, Constructor Bowles, who gave those pros and cons and who weighed those things before coming before our committee was strongly in favor of building some ships in the navy-yards, showing that certainly, to his mind, the reasons for building some ships in our navy-yards were entitled to far more consideration than those against the proposition.

Here is what Constructor Stahl, of the Norfolk Navy-Yard, says.

I hope every gentleman will give this matter attention. When a question is asked what the cost of a ship built by private shipbuilders is, they give you the amount authorized by the bill, say $3,000,000, and it is rare that they will include in the statement of cost armor and armament, furniture, and other kindred things. None of his evidence has been denied, and I take it none of it can be denied.

Constructor Stahl, of the Norfolk yard, says:

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I would like to ask you a question, going back to the matter that we have had under discussion. You have Mr. Bowles's statement. Summarizing his statement, or answering, what in your judgment would be the wisest thing for the Government to do—construct or not to construct vessels in the navy-yards?

Mr. STAHL. I think there is no doubt whatever about the advisability of constructing a certain proportion of our ships in the principal navy-yards. To me this seems so self-evident a proposition that it hardly needs argument.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Is that answer predicated upon the same reasons assigned by Mr. Bowles?

Mr. STAHL. Substantially the same. There is one thing I might add. Briefly, I think we can build at some of our principal yards, equipped with modern tools as they are, even more cheaply than Mr. Bowles thinks, and I see no reason why we should not build as cheaply there as can be built at any private yard.

Right here I will say that when we built ships ten or twelve years ago in our navy-yards we were not prepared to build them as we are now. We did not then have the immense strong machinery for lifting and moving large parts of the vessels. We have improvements in the navy-yards now that they have in the private shipyards.

Mr. METCALF. In your judgment would it lessen the cost of repairs if they had one or two vessels on the stocks?

Mr. STAHL. There is no question whatever; it is as certain as anything can be.

Let us assume, for the sake of argument, that the navy-yard and the private yard can build a certain ship at exactly the same cost. Let us further assume that the cost of hull and machinery, say for a ship like the Indiana, is $3,000,000, and that the contractor or the Norfolk yard can either of them build it for this sum. With the contractor you make a contract for $3,000,000. With the navy-yard you simply give the order to build the ship. The navy-yard spends $3,000,000 for hull and machinery. The contractor also builds the hull and machinery, for which the Government pays him $3,000,000. Now, then, in the navy-yard we go on; we make necessary changes the same as in a private yard. We provide armor, we run her speed trial, and do all other necessary work not covered by the contract or original order.

In all these ways we spend, say, another $3,000,000 before the ship is finally completed in the yard. That work has to be done in the case of the contract-built ship just the same, and the Government has to pay for it just the same. In the case of the Indiana the Government paid out for this extra work—I did not just now mean to say $3,000,000; in the Oregon it was nearly $3,000,000—but in the Indiana the Government paid out for this identical work $2,300,000. In the one case the navy-yard spends $3,000,000, and then $2,300,000 more. Then we say, and say truthfully, that the navy-yard ship has cost $5,300,000 altogether. But you go and ask the price of the corresponding ship that was built at the private yard, and, unless the man you ask is well informed, he will say the contract price was $3,000,000, leaving you to infer, if you choose, that that was the total cost.

Mr. MUDD. That is what I want to get at.

Mr. STAHL. That is the erroneous comparison. The contract price is not the total cost. It is only a portion of the total cost; and in some cases it has been barely half the price.

Mr. MUDD. From the result of your observations, I would judge that in past times building in navy-yards did not cost any more.

Mr. STAHL. No; I am of the opinion that many of the comparisons made in the newspapers have been very misleading.

One word more about this inspection. You paid $60,000, plus a good deal more, to inspect the work on the Kentucky. If you built that ship at a Government yard, you would have to inspect the work also, but the same men who do the designing and superintending would do the inspecting, and it would not begin to cost you anything like that sum. Furthermore, consider the contract price of the Kentucky, $2,250,000. I tried to get the cost of the changes on her, which I know to be large, though doubtless entirely proper, but I could not get them in time. When you contracted for that ship, you did not include the furniture, or the blocks, or boats, or cooperage, and lots of other things in the contract. I built those articles at the Norfolk Navy-Yard. They cost $50,000. What did the Kentucky really cost? That $50,000 must be added to her contract price. So must also the cost of inspection, cost of authorized changes, and many other items. That sort of thing goes right straight through. There lies the danger of making a wrong comparison. A comparison of the contract price in the one case and the actual cost in the other is utterly misleading.

Now, Constructor Baxter says:

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Do you think it would be wise or unwise for the Government to construct one or more ships at this yard?

Mr. BAXTER. I do consider it would be very wise for the Government to construct a certain number of ships at its yards.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Do you indorse the view taken by Mr. Bowles and Mr. Stahl in regard to keeping a ship constantly under construction in a yard?

Mr. BAXTER. I think that is a great advantage.

Mr. DAYTON. What is your opinion under present conditions, if we should undertake to do any work in navy-yards; what character of vessels do you recommend should be given to the yards and what given to contract?

Mr. BAXTER. I should give armored cruisers to the navy-yards.

Mr. DAYTON. The great big ones?

Mr. BAXTER. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAYTON. The largest vessels ever undertaken—the new types?

Mr. BAXTER. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAYTON. Will you give your reasons for that?

Mr. BAXTER. Because in doing that the yards are able to do anything else they will ever be called upon to do; that is the reason.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Would that be in any sense an experimental construction on the part of the yards?

Mr. BAXTER. No, sir; not at all; no more than any other work that is undertaken here. There are certain set plans and certain set specifications, and the people in charge use skill, and knowledge, and judgment in directing and carrying on the work.

Mr. HAWLEY. Could you give the construction of an armored cruiser as large as 12,000 tons to a navy-yard?

Mr. BAXTER. Yes, sir.

These extracts are not exceptional, but are fair samples of the testimony. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, the other point which I said I would charge on this bill was the extravagance. I ask the Chairman how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has twelve minutes remaining.

Mr. KITCHIN. Well, I have not time to yield to anyone; and I want to run over some of the items of extravagance, as I see it. As I understand it, Mr. Chairman, this bill carries an appropriation of $13,000,000 in excess of any bill heretofore reported, and an excess of $26,000,000, or nearly double, of any naval bill heretofore reported in time of peace. This enormous excess shows a strong tendency of the American Congress to extravagance.

Gentlemen have spoken here, the gentleman that preceded me, our able and distinguished acting chairman, who has the highest respect of every member of the minority, and, I take it, certainly of the majority, and the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS], and both have shaken in our faces here what Germany is going to do, what Italy is going to do, and what England is going to do. The very paper that the acting chairman read showed you that in sixteen years from now, according to the German programme, that the German navy would double itself in tonnage.

But, gentlemen, if we were only asked to double ourselves in tonnage in sixteen years, there would certainly be no necessity for the two battle ships. I do not think they are necessary, and to them I object as one of the minority, though there are some who do not object to them. If we should proceed for the next sixteen years increasing our Navy as is done in this bill, then, instead of doubling our Navy in tonnage in the next sixteen years, we would quadruple it. [Some gentlemen shook their heads.] Yes, sir; this bill makes a provision for about 90,000 tons of war ships, according to my estimate, and a like tonnage for sixteen years, added to our present Navy, would equal the navy that England has to-day. But if the German programme is carried out, which I understand would add 422,000 tons to the German navy—am I correct? I will ask the gentleman from Illinois if his statement was not to the effect that the German navy would be increased by 422,000 tons in the next sixteen years?

Mr. FOSS. That is true.

Mr. KITCHIN. Then, if that is true, my statement is true, because in this bill the two battle ships are of 12,500 tons each. That is 25,000 tons, and three armored cruisers, each of 13,000, is 39,000, which make 64,000 tons; and then the three smaller cruisers, of 8,000 tons each, making 24,000 tons, run it up to 88,000 tons this year, while the German navy in all that time would increase a little over 26,000 tons a year, and we will be more than trebling the increase of the German navy annually. While she may double her navy in sixteen years, we will, at the rate of this bill, quadruple our present navy and have a navy more than twice as large as the German navy then, according to the figures on which the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from New York based their calculation.

Therefore I shall follow the recommendations of the Secretary of the Navy. When he sent his report to Congress he did not recommend the building of these two battle ships, but did recommend the building of cruisers, both large cruisers and small cruisers.

Mr. FOSS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question right there?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. FOSS. If you are against the building of the battle ships, why are you in favor of the armor-plate factory plant? Battle ships use armor plates, but armored cruisers use not more than 10 or 12 per cent of the amount of their displacement.

Mr. KITCHIN. That is a fair question. I do not hesitate to answer the gentleman. I state that in this conflict we expect to be run over on this battle-ship question, and I want to meet the doubt by settling the armor-plant question in favor of the people. And of course, whether we strike out the battle ships in this bill or not, we will have to provide over 25,000 tons of armor besides that now needed, and we will probably continue for some time to come to build a battle ship or two now and then. I do not believe that we need the two extra battle ships. The Secretary of the Navy did not recommend them.

Mr. DAYTON. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. KITCHIN. Certainly.

Mr. DAYTON. Do I understand the gentleman to mean that his advocacy of the armor-plate factory is in order to avoid the construction of battle ships?

Mr. KITCHIN. No; the gentleman from West Virginia does not so understand me, nor does anybody else. I gave what I considered a proper reply to the question propounded by the gentleman from Illinois. If we never authorize another battle ship, we already have in sight the necessity for more than 20,000 tons of armor, and the armored cruisers will require armor. It is probable that we will continue to need armor for a long time. But that question will come up under the five-minute debate, and perhaps some of us will have something more to say at that time about it.

Now, another increase. Let me read from the minority views just this:

But to this particular bill: It seems to us that some appropriations are practically duplicated in the bill by stating a sum total in one part of it for some purpose and then also stating in other parts of the bill specific amounts for the same purposes in each navy-yard. As for example, "For repair and preservation" of navy-yards and stations in one item is given $500,000. Also, for the maintenance of yards and docks is given $475,000. Then under each navy-yard is given a specific sum for repairs and improvements, in the aggregate amounting to $210,000. If the committee were to put these items together, it would tend to attract the attention of the public more closely, for they amount to $1,185,000.

In addition to this, Mr. Chairman, every single item of new repairs and improvements that have occurred to the Secretary of the Navy were, as I understand it, recommended in his report or in his letter to the committee.

Another thing for the civil establishment. Mr. Chairman, I suppose it is not known to all that our different civil establishments in the different navy-yards cost this Government $255,000 for civil-clerk hire. It is a result of our bureau system. There are nine different bureaus, if I make no mistake, and each bureau at every navy-yard has to have its own department and its own quarters, its own clerical force, and everything else pertaining to it; and if one department gets a little ahead of the other in dignity or expense, they all try to even it up. I think it encourages a spirit of emulation in extravagance, and I believe the bureaus ought to be consolidated in some way, and diminish their number. I believe it is a cumbersome system and occasions a great deal of unnecessary expense to the Government.

Mr. FOSS. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. KITCHIN. Certainly.

Mr. FOSS. Does the gentleman think $255,000 for clerk hire is extravagant, in consideration of the fact that we are spending millions of dollars at the navy-yards and have invested there in property to the value of probably $50,000,000?

Mr. KITCHIN. I do think it is an extravagant appropriation on account of your bureau system. I understand this is an appropriation for nine different bureaus; that means for the civil establishment about $30,000 for each bureau, when if we only had two or three bureaus, the same clerical force which now acts for one bureau could act for three or four, and instead of its requiring $30,000 for clerk hire, I believe it could be done for less than $10,000. I am not as old in naval affairs as the gentleman from Illinois, but I am giving the House the honest conclusions I have arrived at in my service upon that committee and trying to do it plainly.

Mr. DAYTON. If my friend will pardon me, do you think one head is capable of performing the duties and managing the Bureau of Steam Engineering, of Navigation, of Medicine and Surgery, and Equipment and Supplies, and the many other branches that require experts in the Navy Department?

Mr. KITCHIN. In response to that I will say that I understood the theory of the majority is that it is now under one head, the Secretary of the Navy; and whenever we attack it, they say it is practically under one head. I do say, however, that one man who is master of his business would have intelligence enough to surround himself, not with independent heads of independent bureaus, but with competent men to advise him. He would have such help as he could depend upon. I imagine he would have the finest engineer he could get; he would have the best other officers under him; he would have the best men obtainable, and take their advice, and then he would not require so much clerical force in these different situations.

Mr. DAYTON. Would it make any difference whether he was called a head of a bureau or a surgeon-general?

Mr. KITCHIN. I claim nothing on account of their titles. Under the present conditions we know there are independent bureaus with independent heads, making independent reports, and all trying to take care of themselves, and, incidentally, of each other. If they were all under one head, one controlling mind, one brain to guide and direct this entire naval business of the United States; if the man at the head had sufficient wisdom to gather about him the experts of these different divisions, it would not be the same as it is now. It would be a superior system, a more economical system, and not be liable to the charges that can be made against the independent-bureau system.

Mr. DAYTON. One other question. Is not that substantially the fact now?

Mr. KITCHIN. I think not.

Mr. DAYTON. The Secretary of the Navy, the head, had these bureau chiefs and other men gathered around him because they are experts in these matters.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman's statement is doubtless true, but these bureau chiefs, as I understand, are independent of each other, have their own establishments, etc., which makes the system extravagant, expensive, and cumbersome. The gentleman might go on and say that the President is at the head of everything.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] has expired.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I dislike very much to ask for an extension of time; but I would like to have about ten minutes more; I have been interrupted very much.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to extending the gentleman's time for ten minutes? The Chair hears none.

Mr. KITCHIN. Now, Mr. Chairman, only one other item, and I will be through the discussion of this bill. There is in the aggregate for contingent expenses of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery, the Bureau of Equipment, the Bureau of Construction and Repair, the Ordnance Bureau, the Bureau of Steam Engineering, Bureau of Supplies and Accounts, Marine Corps, etc., the sum of $467,300. Now, gentlemen, in all candor, would it not seem that $467,000 would be sufficient for all contingent expenses—for anything that may be contingent or unexpected? But in addition to this appropriation for contingent expenses there is inserted in this bill a new item, in which there is given as an "emergency fund" the sum of $500,000, to be used at the discretion of the President.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in my opinion it would be unwise at any time or on any occasion to give this vast sum of $500,000, to be disposed of as an emergency fund by the President. It is true that we unanimously voted in the last Congress to give the President $50,000,000, because we knew what he wanted to do with it. He wanted to prepare our Navy at once to meet the Spanish enemy. But here is an emergency fund in time of profound peace—an emergency fund of half a million dollars to be placed at the disposal of the Executive. I believe that under the Constitution it is the duty of Congress to appropriate money; and I believe we ought never to exercise that duty unless we know for what specific purpose, as nearly as may be, the money is to be used. I believe that on a question of this kind it is the judgment of Congress that ought to be taken, not the judgment of the Executive.

One other thing, and I say it in all kindness to the other side of the House and to the Executive. We have to-day an Executive who has not been stable in his convictions on great questions affecting this Government. We certainly do not know what position he may occupy six months from now. We know not whether he may, in order to maintain the Navy, decide under his expansion theories to buy some little island out in the South Seas and there entangle us. We know not what he may do. We have heard him declaring at one time the good American doctrine that "forcible annexation is criminal aggression"—a doctrine which we, at least, on this side of the House believe—and then a few months later we have seen him reject that doctrine and advocate oppressive principles under the name of "benevolent assimilation."

We have seen him in December send to this House a well-considered message telling us that free trade was our "plain duty" with the Porto Ricans, and then before the flowers had bloomed change his mind upon the subject. He can not well say, and no other man can well say that he changed in hostility to the trusts; because if his motive was hostility to the trusts, why did he make any reduction at all? If 15 per cent was to be maintained, because he wished to defeat the trusts, why did you not maintain the whole 100 per cent? That cry of being against the trusts will deceive no American citizen.

When we see the President, when dealing with the very basic principles of American government and American liberty, change his mind so quickly, I hesitate to put into his hands an emergency fund of $500,000 to be expended wherever upon the earth or the sea he may see fit.

If the gentleman from Illinois will pursue the argument that he made when he said we could build better ships than any other nation on the face of the earth; that our nation would be the great shipbuilding nation of the world; that we had the steel and the coal and the labor and the intellect to build a great American navy and a great merchant marine—if we can do that; and if foreign nations are to-day, as he told us, having their ships built here, I want the gentleman to consider whether that argument will not lead him to antagonize the Hanna-Payne ship-subsidy bill when it reaches this House. [Laughter and applause.]

I do not share the general opinion that our Navy should be constantly increased to the size of England's. We do not need one so large. We need a strong, well-equipped, well-built, well-armored with the best armor, and well-manned navy. I favor a larger navy, but I do not favor the rate of increase embodied in this bill. Great navies are of great cost, which must be borne by the people. It is proper for the Government officials to submit to Congress their estimates, but it is the duty of the representatives of the people to carefully scrutinize those estimates, and to do so fearlessly. It is easy for high-salaried officials to forget how and from whom the United States gets its revenues. This bill carries more than $61,000,000 cash appropriations, and authorizes contracts for millions more. The ships alone authorized by this bill will probably cost complete $50,000,000, none of which is appropriated by this bill. Internal taxation is bearing heavily upon the people. The question of how to raise our money will be with us always. When the country learns fully of this enormous bill the people will exclaim, "Is it imperialism? Is it colonialism? Is it to keep the Constitution from following the flag?" When they think of the burdens being placed upon them unnecessarily it will be a sad day for the Republicans.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that I have covered the main points upon which I differ with the majority of the committee with regard to this bill. I know that we all have the same patriotic love for America; that we all desire that when we put battle ships on the seas they shall be the best battle ships, the best armored, the best manned of any in the world. No one wants us to face an enemy with inferior machines. And however much gentlemen on the other side may think we on this side are in error, no man can say that any expression or intimation, either by countenance or by word of mouth, has ever escaped the members of the minority contrary to the principles I have just announced, and no man ever will, because we on this side have as much at heart the glory and the honor and the preservation of the American Union as any Republican ever dared to have. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. DALZELL having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills and joint resolution of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

S. R. 114. Joint resolution for the relief of Garfield Hospital;

S. 2762. An act to authorize the Secretary of War to correct the military record of Wynn W. Pefley;

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as the majority—and I mean by that those who are in favor of the report of the committee—have consumed two hours, and we have had only one speech from the minority, I suggest that it is proper that we should at least have another speech from that side before we proceed further upon this side.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. That is not right, Mr. Chairman. I do not think it would be fair to say that the gentleman from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS] represents the majority, because he very specifically stated that while he did not sign the minority report he differed very radically with the majority on many of their propositions.

Mr. CUMMINGS. What is the proposition?

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. The proposition is that he is charging you to his side as having occupied a part of the two hours which he says have been occupied on that side, and he desires us to occupy still more of the time. I will state, Mr. Chairman, that it is customary in debates of this sort to alternate.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I think you ought to alternate.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I think you ought to alternate. I think it would be hardly fair to require some gentleman of the minority to proceed now without giving us any opportunity to hear from any member of the majority who proposes to go into details in defense of this bill. The chairman generalized and summarized the bill in its presentation to the House. We have had absolutely no opportunity to judge of the position the majority propose to take upon the questions at issue. I do not think it is right to require us to proceed on this side, although we want to be entirely fair about it.

Mr. DAYTON. The report shows the position that we take. We stand in defense of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize any gentleman on the committee who desires to take the floor. If no gentleman desires to take the floor, the bill will be read by paragraphs.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Chairman, I was interrupted during my speech, so that I failed to continue a line of argument on which I had started, and that was with regard to the building of ships in the navy-yards of Europe.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the gentleman from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS] consumed all of his time.

Mr. CUMMINGS. The Chair said he would recognize anybody on the committee who wished to take the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair, of course, intended that the gentleman should understand that he would do so under the rules of the committee. He meant any gentleman who had not spoken.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I think if the gentleman from New York [Mr. DRIGGS] wants to take any time he had better go ahead now.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. CUMMINGS. If the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHEELER] is to be recognized, I ask the privilege of extending my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOSS. I ask unanimous consent that I may extend my remarks in the RECORD, and also that I may make a part of my speech the report which I prepared as a part of the bill, including the illustrations.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hardly thinks that latter request is within the province of the committee. That will have to be done in the House. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Does that include the illustrations?

The CHAIRMAN. As far as printing illustrations is concerned, that is a matter in the control of the House and not of the committee.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. That is what I thought.

Mr. KITCHIN. I should like to ask permission to extend my remarks also in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GAINES. I should like to ask consent——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognized the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHEELER].

Mr. KITCHIN. Before that, if the gentleman from Kentucky will yield.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky yield?

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I will yield; yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. I should like to state that I think some one on the other side ought to speak now, because, as I recollect just now, after the gentleman from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS] has spoken——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will suggest that that is a matter for private arrangement.

Mr. KITCHIN. I am going to ask the gentleman to see if that was not the understanding at that time——

The CHAIRMAN. Of course, if no gentleman desires to take the floor, there is but one thing to do and that is to read the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHEELER] has yielded to the gentleman from North Carolina, and he has the right to say what he chooses during the time yielded to him.

Mr. KITCHIN. I just want to state again, to see if I have the correct recollection of the matter——

The CHAIRMAN. Of course this comes out of the time of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHEELER].

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. That is all right. Let it come out of my time.

Mr. KITCHIN. There is a gentleman here who I think ought to speak on the other side, and I will state why. A short time ago, after the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSS] had spoken, and after the gentleman from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS] had spoken, then I did not want to speak this evening, as the Chair well remembers, but the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHEELER] was momentarily absent from the Hall, having been here all day, and when the question came up, as I understood it, the gentleman over here said that both the speeches which had been made had been on the same side, that is, the speeches of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSS], and that therefore one of us ought to proceed on the minority side. Now, if that is true, then certainly one of the gentlemen on the other side, it seems, ought to follow me.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I understand that is a matter which is entirely under the control——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The gentleman from North Carolina is just making the point, though.

Mr. KITCHIN. I was just making the point that was made just now.

Mr. DAYTON. I will say in response to my friend that I do not care to speak unless something else is said against this report.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I will yield my hour of time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DRIGGS], and if the gentleman from West Virginia has anything to say, then I will have something to say.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHEELER] yields one hour to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DRIGGS]. The gentleman from New York is recognized.

Mr. DRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, it is a source of the deepest gratification to me, not only as a Representative upon the floor of this House, but also as a citizen of the Republic, that the Committee on Naval Affairs has deemed it wise to recommend so liberal and important an increase of the Navy. It is also a source of satisfaction to me to realize that upon the question of the increase of the Navy the members of this House stand united, Democrats, Populists, and Republicans alike, all being in favor of the construction of more ships. This policy, if adhered to during the next few years, will demonstrate to the world that we propose at all times to be ready to defend the rights of American citizens, protect American ships, and uphold the honor of the nation wherever it may be necessary.

There are, however, several features of the bill to which the minority members of the committee filed an adverse report, and while I know nothing about an armor-plate plant, I desire to express my concurrence in their views in relation to the policy of constructing some one of the proposed ships in the navy-yards. I will also endeavor to demonstrate that it would be advisable for the Government to inaugurate the policy of constructing a certain proportion of its ships in its own navy-yards.

I propose to commence my remarks by going back to the time when Great Britain first authorized the construction of war ships in her own yards; then coming to a later period, to treat of her method of comparing the relative cost of vessels constructed in her dockyards with those built by contract in private yards, and then to the time showing what we, the United States, did, and why, if we adopted the same system, the same fair plan of action that Great Britian had adopted, there would be no question whatever as to whether we could construct our own ships to-day in our own yards as cheaply as they are to-day constructed in the contract yards.

An account was presented to the British Parliament in 1896 by the admiralty showing the comparative cost of war vessels built under the provisions of the national defense acts of 1889 to 1893, by contract and in the government dock, or, as we say, navy-yard. The report concludes by stating that—

> For the first time a standard, imperfect though it may be, appears to be available by which to test the result of work in Her Majesty's dockyards.

The comptroller and auditor-general, Sir Charles L. Ryan, appended to this report the following statement:

> The comparative results show that dockyard shipbuilding is more favorable in the case of first-class battle ships, but not so economical, so far as can be judged by aggregate cost under the other types; while it is noticeable that dockyard results under the same types vary considerably inter se.

Note carefully that notwithstanding the extra cost of all classes of war ships, excepting battle ships, built in the English dockyards as compared with private or contract dockyards, the English Government, alike famous for its navy and the most economical administration thereof of all its various departments, adheres rigidly to this day to its policy of constructing a certain number of war vessels in its own dockyard.

Now, then, Mr. Chairman, you will notice it was in 1889 that the English national-defense act was passed. Four years transpired, to 1893, and still no comparisons were allowed by the English Parliament between the Government-built ship and the contract-built ship. Three years longer went by, to 1896, before these comparisons were allowed or were made, and why? These statements that I am now giving in relation to the English-built ships are from a paper written by Mr. Francis Elgar, delivered before the Institute of Naval Architects in 1896 in Great Britain.

Mr. Elgar is considered by all naval authorities the world over to be the most expert in this line of evidence now living. I believe that is conceded by most naval architects and most naval theorists, at least so far as the construction of ships is concerned.

When they first commenced building war vessels in the Government dockyards what did they find? They found in the contract yards, or private yards, as I shall call them, different systems in every single solitary particular. They had different methods of bookkeeping, different methods of acquiring material, and different labor-saving devices unknown to the dockyards. They found the private machine shops better equipped, better located, and more convenient to the work to be performed than those in the dockyards.

When the Government started in to compare, it did the only just and fair thing. It reformed and revised its entire system of constructing ships and account keeping in the English dockyards. It appointed a commission, which went all over Great Britain to the great private yards. The owners of the private yards allowed comparisons to be made between their systems of bookkeeping and the Government system of bookkeeping; I mean account keeping in every single particular; and after the Government had made a most careful study of the subject, it adopted the best system that could be conceived, namely, the best of the various systems of all other yards.

It then found, in addition to that, that the machine shops and other buildings, to which I alluded a while ago, were not as conveniently located in Government dockyards as in the private yards. They made an allowance for each and every one of these things, and then came the question of labor. In the Government yards it was ascertained, and beyond any question of doubt whatever, that the laborers first employed in the Government dockyards were not equal in productive ability to the laborers employed and engaged in the private yards. And why? Because the private yards had for a great many years—some of them established in 1853 and one of them established in 1849—been making merchant ships, been building the merchant marine, and therefore their laborers better understood the art of shipbuilding. The men employed by the Government in the Government dockyards when the Government commenced building warships therein, in 1883, understood practically nothing about their construction and therefore were at a great disadvantage.

There are many little details in relation to these yards that I do not care to allude to just now; but I will say that from the time the national-defense act was passed until 1893 70 ships were built. There were 8 first-class battle ships, 2 second-class battle ships, 9 first-class cruisers, 29 second-class cruisers, 4 third-class cruisers, 18 torpedo boats, and nearly all these ships were building or built at the time of the comparison made by Elgar. The construction of the ships were carried out as follows:

Vessels.	Private yards.	Government dockyards.
Battle ships	2	3
Second-class battle ships	Not completed.	Not completed.
First-class cruisers	3	4
Second-class cruisers	17	4
Third-class cruisers	None.	All built in.
Torpedo boats	6	5

The remainder of ships were not in an adequate state of completion for comparison.

Now, I desire to give the figures as to the cost of these ships in relation to their construction in comparison with all these English ships. I regret exceedingly that neither the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LOUDENSLAGER] nor the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] is present, because I would like them to hear this, as it relates to one of the questions asked in the Committee on Naval Affairs:

Average costs of the dockyard and contract vessels of various classes built under the naval defense acts of 1889 and 1893.

The above table is from page 87 of the Transactions of the Institution of Naval Architects of Great Britain for 1896, and while it might be profitable for me to make comment thereon in my own language, I deem it advisable to use the comments of the great naval authority, Francis Elgar, esq., who is the compiler of the same. On page 88 Mr. Elgar uses the following language:

The average amounts shown in Table B show the average cost to the admiralty of the dockyard-built and the contract-built ship, respectively. * * * The expenditure upon the hulls, fittings, and equipment is the actual cost of the work in the case of the dockyard ships, but in the case of contract ships the expenditure shown in the tables includes the unknown but important item of profit or loss to the contractor. This requires to be remembered in judging of the figures.

He also states in other parts of his argument that there was practically no difference in the cost of the principal materials, such as steel, timber, and other large items between the admiralty and the contract built ships. He states, further, that there were differences of rates of wages, and especially in the individual earnings of certain classes of piece workers, and then in detail we are told the various classes of labor in the private yard, which received higher wages than those in the Government yards. I might mention, taken at random from that list, riveters, drillers, wood workers, and ordinary mechanics.

But their output of work was greater than the work of the same class of men in the Government yards. It is also demonstrated beyond question that another reason for the additional labor cost on the Government-built ships in these English dockyards, as compared with the contract ships, was the fact that the various machine shops, hoisting cranes, and other large pieces of machinery absolutely essential in the construction of a ship were not as centrally located as the machine shops, hoisting cranes, etc., in the private yards. This point is so very important that I would respectfully ask every member of this House to take it into careful consideration when finally voting upon the proposition submitted in the report of the minority.

Mr. Chairman, I respectfully apologize to the House for quoting so liberally from the article written by Mr. Elgar, but I can not make too emphatic the fact that he is considered by naval architects the world over as the most eminent specialist on the subject here under consideration. He states in relation to the labor that—

The differences of cost of work, whatever these may be, apart from the profits or losses upon contracts, appear to be due not very much to difference in prices of material or rates of wages, but chiefly to the extent to which the various yards are laid out and are equipped with machines and appliances for performing this class of work with facility and economy and at a minimum of expenditure for the transport and handling of materials and the employment of labor upon them; and also to the good organization of the labor with reference to the special requirements of the work, * * * and at such rates as contribute most effectively to the general progress and economy of the whole.

You will probably notice in the table above given that some of the English dockyard-built ships are cheaper than the contract ships, while others are more expensive, the greater expense of the Government-built ships being particularly noticed in the case of first-class cruisers. This, however, was easily explained away by Sir Nathaniel Barnaby, K. C. B., one of the Admiralty, who stated that the additional cost was brought about entirely through the changing of the gun mounts on the dockyard ships and not changing the gun mounts on the contract ships; that is to say, that the first-class cruisers built in the dockyards were arranged with heavy muzzle-loading rifles. But as these rifles became obsolete prior to their completion, the Admiralty was forced to have the gun mounts sufficiently heavy for the satisfactory support of the guns of heavier tonnage.

The total cost, including the incidental charges, of the first-class battle ships built in the Government dockyards, was £843,000 (see table), while in the contract yards it was £882,000; or, in other words, a difference of about £39,000 in favor of the Government-built ships. That is as to the battle ships.

The next item is that of the first-class cruisers. There are two classes given, and in all these classes in mentioning cruisers two classes are referred to—the sheathed and the unsheathed. The first-class sheathed cruisers built at the Government dockyards cost £397,000, while the cost of the contract-built first-class sheathed cruiser was £374,000. The cost of the unsheathed first-class cruiser in the Government dockyards was £402,000, and the contract-built cost £360,000.

In the second-class cruisers you will find that the difference is so small that it is hardly worth mentioning. In the sheathed class the difference in favor of the contract ship was about £14,000, and in the case of the unsheathed ship it was about £15,000.

In the third-class cruisers it amounted to some £24,000. In the case of torpedo boats and torpedo gunboats it amounts to about £14,000 difference. Great Britain and France through their reports have conceded that torpedo boats can not be built as cheaply in the Government yards as they can in private yards. They also concede that torpedo gunboats can not be built as cheaply in Government yards as they can in private yards and that third-class cruisers can not be built as cheaply; but battle ships and first and second class cruisers, sheathed and unsheathed, can be built more cheaply to-day in these Government yards than they can be built in private yards.

The expense given in these items which I read a moment ago upon the hulls, fittings, and equipments is the actual cost of the work in the case of the dockyard ships, but in the case of contract ships the figures contained in the tables include the unknown but important item of profit or loss to the contractor, and to that I will allude later.

In the case of English ships built in the Government yards note carefully that everything conceivable except the armament, stores, and ammunition was included, and by everything I mean hull, machinery, masts, spars, dynamos, derricks, cables, anchors, lifeboats, rafts, gun mounts, and so on.

I mention these different things because when I arrive at one stage of my argument I propose to compare this system with the system in vogue in the United States when our comparisons were made. Under the head "Dock-yard expenditure" you will notice a vast difference in favor of the contract ships, that demonstrates more than any other feature the absolute fairness of the English comparison, inasmuch as these charges were largely made up of surveys of ships on receipts from contractors, steam launches, carrying out the steam, gunnery, electric and torpedo trial trips, and making alterations and repairs.

In our yards at the time ships were constructed, according to an article by Mr. Baxter, a naval constructor of this country, in a paper read by him on navy-yard expenses, he most emphatically states that in many cases the masts, rigging, electrical plants, and miscellaneous articles were not included in the specifications given out to the contractors for the contract-built ships in our country, and when provided by the shipyard additional compensation was paid.

He says, further, with every war ship numerous small but expensive fittings and many minor changes and additions are necessary after some experience with the crew on board. This work has usually been done by the navy-yards, but when done by the shipyards they have received additional compensation. During the greater portion of the decade premiums were offered for trial results which exceeded the contract requirement; the amounts thus earned varied with different ships, but their totals caused increased expenditure on the part of the Government amounting to no small proportion of the total contract price. The contractors were also reimbursed for the cost of these trial trips.

I do not wish at present to go extensively into the subject of cost of labor in our yards, but will prepare for the treatment of this subject by submitting the following statement of cost per ton of the labor employed in the construction of certain ships in Her Majesty's dockyards:

Statement of cost per ton, weight of hull, fittings, and equipments, exclusive of armor and protective-deck plating, of the labor employed in the construction of the undermentioned ships in Her Majesty's dockyards.

The Barham	1888–1891	34 18
The Crescent	1890–1893	33 4

This table is in many ways fully as instructive and important as the table first given, for you will note in the construction of the Colossus seven years were necessary for its full completion from the date of first laying the keel, and the cost was about $285 a ton for wages; while in the case of the Royal Sovereign, the last-mentioned battle ship, you will observe that the time required for her complete construction was only about three years, and that the cost for wages was only $160 a ton.

Without going into a full argument on the subject of the cruisers, comparing the length of time and the amount of wage saved from the construction of the Mercury to the building of the Crescent, it is sufficient to say that it is a remarkable fact, demonstrated by the above tables, that as the shipbuilding mechanics became more proficient in their work the length of time necessary for the complete construction of the ships was greatly reduced, and the reduction of wage per ton was also cut down in proportion.

To-day it is a well-known fact to every foreign naval architect that first-class battle ships can be constructed in government dockyards where the equipment is as thorough as in contract yards, at a cost varying from 5 to 10 per cent less, exclusive of incidental charges, than in contract yards. First and second class protected and unprotected cruisers are also being constructed in foreign governmental dockyards from 2 to 3 per cent cheaper than contract charges; while it is freely admitted, on the other hand, that gunboats, torpedo-boat destroyers, and torpedo boats can not be built as cheaply in the government yards as in the contract establishments.

Shipbuilding work in the foreign dockyards has progressed with rapid strides in a straightforward manner, and the friendly rivalry between the mechanics employed by the government and those employed by contract yards has become so great that the work done for the government itself, whether in government or private yards, has been considered infinitely superior to the work prior to 1876, when almost all the work was performed by private contractors. The construction of ships in foreign dockyards is now considered as essential an arm to the national defense as the proper maintenance of a navy or the thorough equipment and training of an army.

Now, Mr. Chairman, why, in all fairness, should we not, in view of the grave responsibilities which have been thrust upon us on account of the war with Spain, take an interest equally as great in our national defense and providing for the common welfare as do those in authority in the nations and countries of the Old World? Some one, however, may say that the figures given by me above, and the authority so liberally quoted, simply deal with the proposition of English dockyards, and before giving in detail the work being done in the various dockyards of the different countries of the Old World allow me to quote the exact language of Bienayme, inspector-general of naval construction of France, in re France:

> In France the cost of war ships, whether constructed in public or private dockyards, is very much the same. In no one case does one see in France the wide differences which have been brought to notice by Mr. Elgar.

Now, you can see from the comparisons made in the English yards they were eminently fair to the Government; and I contend that at the time the comparisons were made in this country we were eminently unfair to the Government. All through England, prior to the date of the comparisons as to the cost of their ships, there was a great hue and cry among the people as to the vast amount of money expended for Government-built ships, and in the House of Commons a member of the House of Commons, whose name I have forgotten, rose in his place on the floor and said it was not right that Great Britain should construct ships in her own yards when they could be constructed so much more cheaply in private yards. The reply then was that the time had not arrived for comparisons to be made between contract ships and Government dockyard-built ships.

From 1883 down to 1896, after thirteen years of continuous construction had passed, the English Admiralty said, "We are ready to compare the cost of ships built in the Government yards and the cost of ships built in the contract yards." I might say, too, that in Great Britain the cost of material to the Government and contractor is practically the same. There large contracts are made, and naval constructors are able to call for any kind of material they may require in the construction of a ship. Suppose, if you please, there has been a thousand tons of steel contracted for; or, if you like, four or five hundred tons of beams, nuts, and bolts that are necessary for the construction of a ship; the naval constructor has the right to telephone or order just such material as he needs on that contract.

Now, I believe our naval constructors in this country are just as honest, and just as capable, and just as fair as any naval constructors on the face of the earth; and if they had that system in this country, they would be able to go into the markets and purchase, as they do in Great Britain, in the cheapest places. [Applause.] The system in this country is all wrong. Mr. Bowles, in his statement before the Committee on Naval Affairs, said that under the system in vogue in this country we are compelled to buy everything of the very best quality; and he also states in another place that in many parts of the ship it is not always absolutely essential to place material of the very best quality.

I mean around the small work—brass and so on used in railings; but under our law everything has to be of the very best. I contend now, on the floor of this House, that in the contract-built ship of the United States built at the private yards contractors do not put in first-class material in all parts of the vessel, such as is called for by the plans and specifications, because it is not necessary for the strength or safety of the ship. I make no invidious comparison or any unjust charges.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. DRIGGS. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman, I perceive, is in favor of constructing ships in the navy-yard?

Mr. DRIGGS. Yes; some of them.

Mr. CANNON. He speaks of buying material out of which to construct ships. Why not go to the end logically and mine the coal, quarry the limestone, erect the furnace and make the steel, cut down the trees and build the sawmills, saw and plane the lumber? Why stop with the construction in the navy-yard; why not make it dead sure and give labor proper employment and prepare all the material? Why not prepare the material that is to enter into the construction of the ship at the Government expense?

Mr. DRIGGS. I will answer with pleasure, because the gentleman from Illinois has been exceedingly courteous to me since I have been a member of the House.

I will say that later in my argument—for I have been granted an hour—I propose to take up the subject of the national defense in connection with Government war-ship building. I believe it should be the policy of this Government, following the policy of England, France, Russia, Germany, Denmark, Sweden, and Austria, to construct some of our ships in our own yards, simply as an auxiliary branch of the national defense. If we deem it necessary to have a standing army, if we deem it necessary to arm our militia, if we deem it necessary to man our ships and our guns, I contend it is just as necessary to have shipbuilding mechanics in our yards as it is to have an efficient small standing army, an efficient militia, and a competent navy. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON. That does not answer my question.

Mr. DRIGGS. I believe that if the Government is authorized to buy its own material at the cheapest rates obtainable there will be no room for dispute when the comparison comes to be made between the cost of the Government constructing ships in its own yards and the construction of them by contract.

Mr. CANNON. But, if the gentleman's argument is good, why should not the Government manufacture its own steel, mine its own coal, cut down its own lumber, erect its own sawmills, etc.?

Mr. DRIGGS. I can understand exactly the point of the gentleman's question, which is, Why should not the Government go into all sorts of business enterprises so far as it needs any kind of material for Government work? On that subject I fully agree with the gentleman. I do not believe it would be advisable for us to erect sawmills, to mine coal, and everything of that kind. But when a question of national policy comes up, then I believe that we as legislators should use our best judgment as to what it is best for the nation to do in that particular case, looking at the business of the nation as a practical question. I do not know that I have answered the gentleman's question, but I have tried to do so.

Mr. CANNON. I do not see that the gentleman has met my question satisfactorily. He, coming from Brooklyn, represents a navy-yard district. In the navy-yard of his district ships may be constructed. I represent a district where we have furnaces, where we mine coal, where we have steel mills (and you can not build ships without steel), where we have lumber also. Now, why should not the Government found a plant in my district where it can manufacture steel, where it can mine coal, where it can cut lumber, etc.? Why should it not make dead sure that the raw material, so to speak, entering into our ships is provided? We have competent mechanics and other workmen there. I desire the gentleman to tell me why this proposition would not be on all fours with the proposition to establish an armor plant?

Mr. DRIGGS. I understand what the gentleman from Illinois wants me to say. I have tried to answer his question. I am not in favor of the Government going into all sorts of business enterprises. But where a question of national policy and national defense is involved I would have the Government take up the question exactly as I believe it should take up a question of financial policy, such as has recently been settled in this House.

Where the honor of the nation may be involved, where it is proper that we should have at all times an able and efficient corps of men to do the work of the Government, where important work is to be done for the defense of the Government, I would have the Government establishments work side by side with those engaged in private business, because in that way they can be a check one upon another, and would do far better work than under a different system. We will procure far better results where private and Government workmen are placed in competition with each other than we could if certain men were allowed to have a monopoly of a certain line of industry. In view of these considerations I believe it can be demonstrated that it is advisable for us to build some of our own ships in our own navy-yards. [Applause.]

Mr. GAINES. Can the gentleman tell us what governments of Europe have their own armor factories?

Mr. DRIGGS. I do not know anything in regard to the armor-plate question. I am not talking about that.

Mr. GAINES. I know that Russia, Italy, and France have their own armor factories.

Mr. DRIGGS. I know nothing about that. I am simply talking of the proposition in regard to Government ships.

To continue, Mr. Bowles explained in his statement before the Committee on Naval Affairs that under our system of yard management requisition upon requisition is frequently needed for the procurement of the simplest necessities. Why this is I know not. It may be the result of a system which is intended as a protection for the Government against extravagance. I simply repeat what I said a few moments ago, that I do not believe our constructors in this country are more extravagant or wasteful of the public money than those of foreign countries.

The labor in foreign yards, taking it as a whole, is of equal productive ability. I gave the reason for that a few moments ago. The mechanics, the foremen, the boys, and the laborers of every description in English dockyards are on a par with those in the English private yards. It is true that in all English ship or dock yards the hours of labor are the same, but the rates of pay are not the same. The rates of pay in private yards are higher than in Government yards, so that the Government has had considerable difficulty in obtaining the best laborers for work in its own dockyards. But at the same time it is said by Professor Elgar that in all probability the average wages, with several exceptions, earned by each of the two classes of men—the one in Government yards and the other in private yards—are about equal, and their productive ability is also equal.

Mr. GAINES. Can the gentleman give us the modus operandi of manufacturing guns at the Government armories at Springfield, Mass., and other places? The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] stated some time ago that the best guns in the world were made at those Government gun factories.

Mr. DRIGGS. I know nothing about the manufacture of guns.

Proceeding with my argument, the following table will show the status of the different navies according to a report issued by the British Parliament in July, 1898:

*Government yard.

ENGLAND.

The following, from Sell's Commercial Intelligence, London, April 8, 1899, shows the tonnage of war ships built by the Government for nine years, the total cost, and the cost per ton:

"It is generally known that the rise in the prices of materials and the increased complexity of ships of war have caused the cost of naval shipbuilding to rise greatly during late years. The following figures show the course of this movement:

Output of Government dockyards.

Year.	Vessels.	Displacement.	Total cost.		Cost per ton.
		Tons.			£ s.
1890	8	22,520	£1,230,910	$5,990,224	49 0	$238.46
1891	8	68,100	3,847,590	18,724,236	56 10	274.95
1892	9	50,450	2,920,430	14,212,273	58 0	282.26
1893	9	32,400	1,729,450	8,416,368	53 0	257.92
1894	8	23,700	1,803,510	8,776,782	67 10	328.49
1895	8	70,350	4,309,690	21,411,091	60 10	294.42
1896	9	73,970	4,287,000	20,863,685	59 12	290.04
1897	4	31,885	1,752,700	8,529,545	55 0	267.66
1898	9	73,090	4,575,120	22,264,821	67 14	329.46

"These figures show that between the years 1890 and 1898 there was an increased cost of nearly £19 per ton for the completed ship of war, which is, of course, a serious factor in the annual naval expenditure." This includes everything, hull, machinery, armor, and armament.

GERMANY.

The German Government owns three shipbuilding yards—one at Kiel, one at Wilhelmshaven, and one at Danzig—which are exclusively used for the building of vessels for naval purposes. Since 1873 the following war ships have been built for the German navy: Five armored frigates, 8 armored corvettes, 13 gunboats, 2 artillery ships, and 10 torpedo boats. Besides the imperial shipbuilding yards, private yards are to a great extent employed in building vessels for naval purposes, as the three imperial yards do not have sufficient capacity to supply the demand. However, the building of ships in private yards does not affect the cost. * * *

Germany was handicapped in the start by want of resources and experience in iron working, and still more by a general lack of confidence—even on part of German shipowners—that the shipyards of this country could turn out iron vessels comparable in quality and price with those produced by British constructors. The managers of the Lloyd and Hamburg companies shared this distrust, and down to as late a date as 1880 their steamers were practically all built on the Clyde and the Mersey.

Meanwhile, ten years earlier, and just before the memorable epoch of 1870, the Prussian Government had established at Kiel and Wilhelmshaven yards for the construction and repair of war vessels, which work had been hitherto done almost exclusively in this country at Danzig. The events of 1870 made it imperative for the newly consolidated German Empire to build and equip a navy in its own shipyards and at the earliest possible moment.

The Government yards were inadequate to the task, so a contract was given to the private Vulcan shipyard at Stettin for the construction of the armored frigate Preussen, which was so quickly and satisfactorily executed that a second vessel, the armored corvette Hansa, was ordered. The building of the Preussen marks the date of the revival. The confidence of the admiralty was secured: it was shown that armored war vessels could be designed and constructed in Germany. * * *

ITALY.

In the last thirty years the building of war ships has become one of the great industries of the country. Italy has four national and three private important shipyards.

The war ships are built in the Government navy-yards at Castellamare di Stabia, both by the Government and under private contract. The Government has approved the recommendation of the Italian minister of marine for building four new first-class battle ships. These will be given out to private contractors.

There are now in the course of construction at the navy-yard in Venice the Ferruccio; at Spezia, the battle ship Regina Margherita; at Castellamare di Stabia, the Benedetto Brin, the Agordat, and the Coatit—the last one being about ready to launch and the Agordat now receiving her armament.

At the Naples yard they are finishing the war ship Emmanuele Filiberto, and in the private shipyard Orlando, at Leghorn, they are building the Varese, and at the private arsenal at Sampierdarena the Garibaldi. The Government is also reported to have concluded a contract with the steel works at Terni for furnishing 5,000 tons of armor plates for the ships now building, and a further contract for 35,000 tons to complete said ships will be given out in the immediate future. At Naples no ships are built, but only finished as to machinery and equipments.

JAPAN.

Aside from the construction of small cruisers, gunboats, torpedo boats, and launches, but little has been attempted in the more difficult work of building men-of-war. After the establishment of the large government iron and steel foundry efforts in this direction may be expected. At present nearly all material for steamship building is imported. Steel plates are now laid down here at from £8 5s. to £9 15s. ($40.15 to $47.44) per ton.

AUSTRIA-HUNGARY.

Nearly all the war ships of Austria-Hungary have been built at home, the majority in the imperial navy-yard at Pola, and five or six cruisers and a dozen torpedo boats by the Stabilimento Tecnico, of Trieste. The last-mentioned company has also built a number of war ships for the Argentine Republic, Uruguay, and Roumania. The building of war ships at Trieste is said to have no noticeable effect upon the cost of constructing merchant ships.

NETHERLANDS.

The following list of war ships built since the year 1894 was sent by this official:

"LIST OF WAR SHIPS BUILT IN THE NETHERLANDS SINCE 1894.

"Government dockyard, Amsterdam (Rijkswerf te Amsterdam).—An armored vessel of 3,500 tons displacement, 4,700 horsepower, and 16 knots speed was launched in 1894 and completed in 1896. A protected cruiser of 3,900 tons displacement, 10,000 horsepower, and 20 knots speed was launched in 1896 and completed in 1898. Another protected cruiser of the same type was launched in 1898 and completed in 1899. An armored vessel of 4,950 tons displacement, 6,000 horsepower, and 16 knots speed has been laid down in 1898.

"Private dockyard, Flushing (firm Koninklijke Maatschappij de Schelde te Vlissingen).—An armored vessel of 3,500 tons displacement, 4,700 horsepower, and 16 knots speed was launched in 1894 and completed in 1896. A protected cruiser of 3,900 tons displacement, 10,000 horsepower, and 20 knots speed was launched in 1897 and completed in 1898. Another protected cruiser of the same type was launched in 1897 and completed in 1899. Two unprotected cruisers of 820 tons displacement, 1,250 horsepower, and 13 knots speed were launched in 1896 and completed in 1897.

"Private dockyard, Rotterdam (firm Nederlandsche Stoomboot Maatschappij te Tijenoord).—An armored vessel of 3,500 tons displacement, 4,700 horsepower, and 16 knots speed was launched in 1894 and completed in 1896. A protected cruiser of 3,900 tons displacement, 10,000 horsepower, and 20 knots speed was launched in 1896 and completed in 1898. Another protected cruiser of the same type was launched in 1897 and completed in 1899. An armored vessel of 4,950 tons displacement, 6,000 horsepower, and 16 knots speed has been laid down in 1899.

"Private dockyard, Amsterdam (firm Thijgens en van Gelder, Amsterdam).—One unprotected cruiser of 820 tons displacement, 1,300 horsepower, and 13 knots speed was launched in 1894 and completed in 1895. Another unprotected cruiser of the same type was launched in 1895 and completed in 1896.

"Private dockyard, Amsterdam (firm Nederlandsche Stoomboot Maatschappij te Amsterdam).—Two unprotected cruisers of 790 tons displacement, 1,400 horsepower, and 13.5 knots speed were launched in 1897 and completed in 1898."

DENMARK.

The royal Danish war ships are built exclusively by the Government itself, at the royal navy-yards, and their building has no effect whatever upon the cost of constructing merchant ships.

Relative to the cost of American battle ships in different countries, the chief constructor of the English navy publishes some figures, according to which the English battle ships Nile and Trafalgar, 1885, cost 17,000,000 marks each, while those of the Royal Sovereign class cost something less, and those of the Majestic type something more. The cost of the Powerful was 13,000,000 marks.

These figures indicate the cost of construction exclusive of armament and ammunition. The new French battle ships cost 20,000,000 marks each, the United States Indiana 18,000,000, and the latest German battle ships 14,000,000 marks. By figuring the price per ton for the purpose of comparison, using that of the Majestic as a base, and calling it 1, the Nile costs 1.28 per ton, the French battle ships 1.39, the Indiana 1.42, and the Kaiser Friedrich Wilhelm only 1.06 per ton.

If we take into consideration that the last-named ship has been equipped with the new Krupp armor, which costs about one-fifth more than the armor employed on the Majestic, it will be seen that Germany is able to build her warships as cheaply, or even more cheaply, than England, which, in view of the very recent beginnings of German naval construction, must be considered an excellent result. In France the high cost of ships for war and commercial purposes appears to be due to the sluggish working of the administration. As to Russia, Sir William White was unable to give figures, but it is his opinion that they will be very high as regards the new Russian cruisers.

The above information is compiled from Notes on Naval Progress, issued by the Office of Naval Intelligence in November, 1899, and special Consular Reports, volume 18, issued by the Bureau of Foreign Commerce in February, 1900.

Russia has its own shipyard, but lets some of its ships out to contract, and no authoritative statement can be found as to what ships are being built at the Government yard. It will be noted that the governments which build their own ships do so more cheaply than do those who let the ships out to contract.

The gentleman from North Carolina alluded to what some of the foreign countries were doing in relation to the construction of their own ships in their own yards. I have given above statements of that in detail, and I would say that Germany, when it started on its naval programme a few years ago, found it was a very good plan to construct some of its war ships in its own yards for national reasons.

The idea of it is they say that the Government adopted the policy of France and Great Britain because they recognized the fact that they were the two greatest naval powers; and each of them had contended that it was an arm of the national defense to have ready a skilled corps of mechanics to work in government shipyards, for no one knew at what time their services might be necessary to the welfare of the country. Germany therefore decided to do exactly the same as these other countries were doing; and we find that the German Government itself now has three yards, one at Kiel, one at Wilhelms Haven, and the other at Danzig, and we find that the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse is now being constructed at the Government yard at Kiel. That is an 11,000-ton battle ship.

I heard the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs allude to the wonderful progress that Germany was making in her navy, and I also heard the gentleman from New York say that the German Emperor was a believer in a great navy. Now, Mr. Chairman, I say the very nation, the very man, they were praising believe in constructing, irrespective of the cost, some of their war ships at the Government yards; and one of their very finest ships now under construction is being built, as shown, at one of the Government yards. The Tiger, a small gunboat, is also being built in the Government yard at Danzig. Germany does not say for one moment that it is necessary to construct all the ships in the Government yards. It simply says, "We will construct a portion of the ships in the Government yards;" and there is not one advocate on the floor of this House in favor of the policy of constructing Government ships at the Government yards that will get up here and advocate the policy of constructing every one of the Government ships in the Government yards.

The Government would then be in exactly the same position that it was. There would not then be two different branches, one acting as a check against the other, each one full of the spirit of rivalry with the other, one set of mechanics and artisans striving to do better work than the other. Therefore I say that those who advocate building ships in the navy-yards only want to build a fair and square proportion.

I find that Italy also constructs some ships in her own yards, and in the last twenty years the building of war ships has become one of the great industries of the country. Italy has four national and three private important shipbuilding yards. I find that there were building in the Government yards two gunboats—the Agordt and the Coatit—each with 1,320 tons displacement.

In Japan they have not started the construction of war ships in their own yards.

I find that Holland constructs all the ships that she now has in her own yards, and has constructed them, and has one, the Utrecht, now on the stocks.

Russia and France I will not go into extensively. The tables are self-explanatory.

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman yields to me to read a short letter, addressed to me in reply to one I wrote to M. Jules Bœufve, chancellor of the French embassy here, dated January 24, 1898:

EMBASSADE DE FRANCE, AUX ETATS UNIS,
Washington, D. C., January 25, 1898.

DEAR SIR: My inability to confer before this with the military attaché of this embassy prevented me, to my regret, from replying any sooner to your favor of the 13th instant. France builds a part of her men-of-war, armor plate, and artillery in government establishments. The rest is constructed by private industries. This mode is followed so as to allow the Government to be independent of private industries in time of peace. On the other hand, in case of war, the Government needs the assistance of private industries, and it would be too late to improvise them in cases of emergencies. For these reasons recourse is had to both sources of production.

Very truly, yours,

JULES BŒUFVE, Chancellor.

Hon. JOHN W. GAINES, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

I also received a letter at the same time from Count Vinci, of the Italian embassy, stating the same fact and about the same reasons; while the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] admitted in debate with me last session that Russia had one.

Mr. DRIGGS. I am very much obliged to my friend from Tennessee, because his remarks are in the nature of corroborative evidence.

Mr. GAINES. It corroborates what you say.

Mr. DRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, coming away from all these foreign yards—and I know this discussion is rather lengthy and technical—but coming away from these foreign yards to construction in our own yards; and so far as the comparing of the policy of the two is concerned, everything was done by Great Britain and other foreign nations to aid the Government in its comparison and everything the reverse was done in this country.

Every member of the Committee on Naval Affairs knows the navy-yards were not able or capable of building a Government ship at the time the comparisons were made in this country, not to mention war ships, as economically as those on the outside, for the very reason that the plants were not equipped as well as they should have been, and they had no machinery or anything to facilitate construction.

I desire to allude, Mr. Chairman, to the report of the then Chief of Bureau of Construction and Repair to the Secretary of the Navy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and would have every member understand, in reading these comparisons of the completeness of the navy-yards in 1897, that they did not begin to be in the condition that they were in 1888, when we first started to build our own ships in our own yards. I find in 1888 in the Norfolk Navy-Yard and in the Brooklyn Navy-Yard they had practically no machinery whatever.

Constructor Stahl, in a statement before the Naval Committee, practically said that at the time the Texas, Maine, Raleigh, and Cincinnati were built the Norfolk Navy-Yard and the Brooklyn Navy-Yard were equipped for the construction of wooden ships and had no modern machinery, nothing for the amalgamation of steel or for the placing of plates in position, etc., and the Government, through absolute necessity, authorized Constructor Bowles at Norfolk to put up a shed in order that he might have some place to make tools and other essentials for shipbuilding.

We find in 1897 a long list of things necessary in the Brooklyn and Norfolk navy-yards. I notice that the constructors in their recommendations as late as 1897 say they needed a new construction foundry, pattern shops, machine shops, equipment shop, joiners' shop, new machinery in the block shop, and so on. To-day—1900—it is entirely different.

The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] stated how many million dollars had been appropriated by the Government for the thorough equipment of the navy-yards at Norfolk and at Brooklyn. I say now, taking into consideration the fact that Great Britain was able to construct ships as cheaply in the Government yards as in private yards, that to-day in this country, with this thorough equipment of our own Government yards, we are able to construct ships as cheaply there as in the private contract yards. [Applause.]

Mr. GAINES. And that is true in the face of the fact that we work on the Government plant only eight hours a day, while the private concerns work ten hours.

Mr. DRIGGS. Yes; that is right. Secretary Long has told us that the length of time that was required for the construction of a ship in the Government yard was very much longer than it was in a private yard. I did not know until to-day why it was that there had been such great delay in the construction of some of our ships. I thought it advisable to look into the statement of the Secretary, and I went up to the Department and procured from them tables stating the state of completion of each and every one of our ships, which is as follows:

I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs the reason for the fact that while there has been no armor for the Missouri, she is only 1 per cent completed to-day? I notice that she was authorized, that the contract was signed, on the 11th of October, 1898. I am merely asking this for information.

I also notice that the battle ship Maine is only 22 per cent toward completion, and she was authorized, or the contract signed, on the 21st of October, 1898. I notice that the Ohio, another battle ship, authorized on the 5th of October, 1898, is only 15 per cent toward completion. Coming down to the sheathed protected cruisers, where comparatively little armor is necessary, I find there, with the exception of the Albany, which we purchased from Armstrong, that upon the cruisers Denver, Galveston, Tacoma, and Cleveland there has not been the first iota of work performed. This list was corrected up to March 1, 1900.

I also find under the class of monitors that the Arkansas, to be built by the Newport News Shipbuilding Company, is 19 per cent toward completion. The Florida, built by the Nixon's, is only 25 per cent, and we find the Maryland Steel Company has the Truxton, the Whipple, and the Worden only 9 per cent toward completion. The Bath Iron Works has the Biddle only 5 per cent completed. And so it goes. I contend on the floor of this House that every single one of these private contractors has been using for the last ten years, and up to the present time, the Government work as a nucleus for private work.

It is well known to every man engaged in shipbuilding in this country that it is absolutely impossible to get an agreement out of the Newport News Company, the Cramps, the Bath Iron Works, or the Nixons to build a first-class ship for ocean or sea purposes in less than two years, and I claim now that we are giving them so much Government work to-day that instead of aiding private industry and private enterprise we are injuring the development of our industries to which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] alluded.

In these private shipyards to-day the Government is taking up the time needed by private individuals who are engaged in developing our commerce. I read an article in one of the newspapers a few days ago, whether true or not I can not say, that one great transportation company, the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, was unable to have one steamer finished on contract time. The article did not say why, but I say why; because the Government itself is taking up the time of the Cramps, and these other yards, with work that is the nucleus for the other work. I say the time has come when the Government should construct some ships in its own yards. The time is to-day, when our navy-yards are in magnificent condition.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have explained about the cost of the system of buying material and the hours of labor; now let me allude to the length of hours of labor in this country in the Government yards as compared with the private yards. I find that eight hours constitute a days' work in the Government yards and ten hours in the contract yards.

Notwithstanding the fact that the hours of labor are so radically different—two hours longer in the private yards than in the Government yards—I contend that, allowing for the fact that the Government does not have to pay interest, does not have to pay dividends, does not have to pay taxes, does not have to pay insurance, does not have to allow for plant depreciation, the cost of labor in a Government yard will be more than offset by the expenses which the Government does not have to pay, but which the private contractor does have to pay. While this statement may not be easily proved, I make it because I believe with the perfect machinery now installed in the various great navy-yards of this country the experiment would demonstrate its accuracy.

Each and every one of our naval constructors has said time and again that he desired these ships of ours—some of them, at least—to be built in the Government yards. Mr. Chairman, I contend that the advice and suggestions of the naval constructors should be heeded, for they are the trained experts of the Government and the experts upon whom the Government relies in all questions appertaining to shipbuilding. I can truly say that what the lawyer is to his client, the physician to his patient, the insurance surveyor to the insurance company, the newspaper reporter to the newspaper, the bank president to the director, the naval constructors are to the Government and the people.

I can not make this point too emphatic, because the constructors have been educated at public expense and their lives devoted to study of these very questions. When they recommend the construction of some of our war ships in the navy-yards, there is no higher or better authority that can be appealed to as to the wisdom of such a policy. We rely upon them for the inspection of the ships building in contract yards, and I contend that, expense or no expense, their recommendations should be heeded and given far more consideration than the recommendations of any member of the Naval Affairs Committee or of the Secretary of the Navy himself.

To show how absolutely unbiased our naval constructors are in making these recommendations and their desire to be thoroughly frank and just, permit me to submit the statement of Naval Constructor Bowles on page 1 of the hearing on shipbuilding in Government yards before the Committee on Naval Affairs March 13, 1900. He gives nine advantages of building ships at Government navy-yards and nine disadvantages. Had Constructor Bowles been anything but an absolutely fair man, he would have said nothing about the disadvantages of building vessels at the navy-yards. I now desire to submit in detail the advantages and disadvantages of Constructor Bowles:

BUILDING SHIPS IN NAVY-YARDS.

Advantages.	Disadvantages.
1. Maintains efficiency of force and plant.	1. Cumbersome system of design and management by independent bureaus.
2. Renders repair work economical and rapid.	2. Wages 30 per cent to 40 per cent higher.
3. Will reduce the amount of repair work by removing the necessity for maintenance of force.	3. Boy and unskilled labor is not used to advantage on account of artificial restrictions of labor board.
4. Maintains a standard of workmanship and design on basis of practical experience.	4. Eight hours' work against ten.
5. Provides training for those who must inspect contractors' work.	5. Seven holidays full paid.
6. No profit to be made.	6. Purchase of material by the navy system involves delay and extra cost.
7. The indirect charges in commercial practice which make a large percentage of cost are not included, because they are already provided and are maintained for other purposes, viz: Interest on plant, taxes, insurance, depreciation and care of property, large proportion of office and organization expense.	7. Outside plants are better arranged and no restrictions are placed on utilization of space to the best advantage.
8. Cost of inspection is saved.	8. Per diem compensation is used where piecework is economical.
9. Cost of trial trip is saved.	9. No guaranty of performance under contract conditions.

It hardly seems possible that since we started in to build our new Navy we have constructed 61 new vessels as part thereof. Out of that number there have been only 4 built in Government yards—the Texas, Maine, Raleigh, and the Cincinnati. Now, a word as to the comparative cost of these ships. It has gone all through the country that the contract price of a ship is given as the total cost of the ship. Note carefully here that I say contract price of the ship. Now, in the following table, presented to the Committee on Naval Affairs by Constructor Bowles at the hearing above mentioned, you will find the real facts of the case:

Name.	Date of laying keel.	Date of first commission.	Hull and machinery.			Ship without stores, ammunition, or water in boilers.

* Amount expended in navy-yards. † Contract price.

Referring to the table, we find that the total cost of these ships varied only slightly from the total cost of ships built in private yards. The total cost of the Maine was $4,677,788, or $860 a ton. The cost of the Indiana was $5,983,000, or a cost of $669 a ton. But when we compare the contract price of hull and machinery of these vessels we find that the cost of hull and machinery of the Indiana was only about $3,000,000, and that the cost of the hull and machinery of the Maine was $3,300,000.

It is a most marvelous fact to me that these relative costs were not much larger, because I have shown in a former part of my argument the absolute lack of preparation in the Government yards at that time for the construction of war ships. It has been sent throughout the country that $3,000,000 was the total cost of the Indiana, when in truth and in absolute reality her total cost was $5,783,000, everything being included. This point and others on this subject are most carefully and conclusively brought out and demonstrated by the report of Naval Constructor Stahl in the hearing above alluded to, on page 27 of the said report, which is as follows:

Comparison of contract price with total cost of certain ships.

	Monterey.	Olympia.	San Francisco.	Oregon.	Massachusetts.	Indiana.
Payments on account of contract	$1,647,728.64	$1,796,000.00	$1,423,231.50	$3,272,403.99	$3,045,576.48	$3,055,272.59

Contract price	1,674,839.60	1,796,000.00	1,428,000.00	3,301,540.00	3,000,000.00	3,000,000.00
Excess of total cost over contract price	593,442.15	688,027.54	310,257.82	2,612,511.90	2,311,844.97	2,243,708.05

Taking the Monterey, we find, according to the statement of Mr. Stahl in his evidence before the Naval Committee, that the payment on account of contract was $1,647,000. The excess of contractors' charges for authorized changes was $1,071,000; work done by the Government, $73,000; hull, armor, etc., $237,000; armor for guns' protection, $190,000; total cost, $2,268,000, while the contract price was $1,674,000, the total cost being $593,000 in excess of the contract price.

I would simply say in this connection that the Government yards to-day, according to the very best and most expert evidence, are as thoroughly equipped and ships could be almost as cheaply built there as under contract in private yards. I will, however, qualify that statement. I do not believe that Great Britain has been able to construct a smaller class of war vessels as cheaply in Government yards as in private yards. But I do believe that neither Mr. Bowles, Mr. Baxter, Mr. Stahl, or Admiral Hichborn would recommend the construction of ships in navy-yards unless they deemed it wise, practical, and necessary. I do believe, from the records of other countries, that if they have been able to construct battle ships more cheaply in government yards than in private yards, we in this country will be able to do the same.

Mr. FOSS. Does not the gentleman know that the conditions in England are different from those in this country?

Mr. DRIGGS. Certainly.

Mr. FOSS. Are not the hours of labor in Government yards there the same as in private yards?

Mr. DRIGGS. A few moments ago, while the gentleman was not in the Hall, I referred to this question. I said that the difference in interest charges, insurance, taxes, dividends, etc., would more than offset the difference in other respects between Government yards and private yards, and I am somewhat borne out in this statement by Mr. Baxter, in the statement to which I have alluded. Mr. Baxter figured very extensively on this proposition, and I propose to place his paper in the RECORD.

In consequence of the length of this speech and the vast amount of detail necessary for a fair, careful, and honest demonstration of the advisability of building some of our warships in our navy-yards, I find that I only have a few minutes left for the consideration of two very important items. First, the care and protection of the expensive machinery, tools, and general plant of the navy-yards. I know from my experience as an insurance inspector that plants decrease more rapidly in productive ability when left unused and uncared for than when in full running operation.

Now, why spend millions upon millions of dollars for the equipment of our navy-yards with the finest tools and machinery if we do not intend to keep the tools and machinery in constant use? Constructor Bowles told us that many of the machines in the Government navy-yards had become absolutely ruined through lack of work. It should be the policy of the Government for its own protection and for the economical use of the people's money to keep the Government yards in a state of constant industry.

The other point of which I wish to speak is that of the morale of navy-yard workmen. Every employer of men in every branch of industry knows that there is nothing more demoralizing than periods of intense activity and then periods of great depression. This last expression is that of Constructor Baxter. In no business or manufacturing industry is this truer than in that of shipbuilding. I personally have conversed with many shipbuilding mechanics, and they have universally said that they would prefer to work in shipyards where they could receive constant work and steady weekly compensation than in yards where they receive more than double the pay in other yards, and only work from half to three-quarters of the time.

The reason for this is very plain. Every man engaged in the rearing of a family and of educating his children knows full well that the necessaries of life of all kinds are more readily procured when a weekly compensation is being received. By adopting a policy of having some Government work in addition to the usual and ordinary repair work always in progress at the navy-yards, we are aiding not only the Government itself, but also the shipbuilding mechanics, who are as important a coordinate part of the Republic as are we, their Representatives in Congress.

I have endeavored, Mr. Chairman, in this long argument to show the systems of war-ship construction in all the great foreign nations of the Old World, and have endeavored to prove by the arguments of great naval constructors the world over that it is the height of national wisdom to construct a certain proportion of war ships in a nation's navy-yard. I have compared wages in the dockyards and in the contract yards of the Old World, and I have compared them similarly in this country.

The results of the years of experiment and experience of Great Britain and other foreign powers have most emphatically demonstrated to my mind that the construction of war ships in navy-yards places the Government in an independent position for national defense and relieves it from the danger of any adverse shipbuilding trust or combination; it enables the Government to do its repair work in the most rapid and economical manner; it prevents the depreciation of valuable navy-yard plants; it increases the effectiveness of the productive ability of the wage-earner employed in the navy-yards, and, above all else, as the policy progresses the expense of such construction will be very materially reduced in the Government as well as the private yard.

In the foregoing argument I have endeavored to restrain myself absolutely from the introduction of any partisan or political feature, believing that the proposition is nonpolitical in character and one to be considered in a businesslike manner by this House acting as a business bureau.

Now, in conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I do not believe in or advocate a penny-wise, pound-foolish policy. I do not believe that economy is always the most important item to be considered in governmental affairs.

Imagine, if you will, in time of war—and God forbid that we ever are forced to war—disaster to an American fleet—which also God forbid—with the resultant repairs and new construction absolutely necessary. The question will be raised at once, Where can we repair? Where can we build? If the answer is in private establishments and navy-yards equally as well; a national prayer of relief will be raised by every citizen of the Republic at the wisdom of equipping all Government navy-yards for this character of work, and the money expended will be considered well spent, and the question of the increased expenditure will be forgotten by a grateful people.

APPENDIX A.

REPORT OF MINORITY ON NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Again, we feel compelled to differ with our colleagues on the subject of constructing ships in the Government yards. We reach this conclusion from the evidence before the committee on the subject. Four of the most distinguished and competent constructors of the Navy were heard by us, as well as the Chief of the Bureau of Construction. They all unqualifiedly recommend the construction of ships in the Government yards. The opinions and wishes of bureau chiefs seem to have been followed by the committee in many instances, and in our opinion it is unfortunate that the opinion of the Chief of the Bureau of Construction was not persuasive in this instance also. Nothing that we could say would throw as much light on this question as the testimony of the expert constructors, and we submit a few extracts from the evidence of three of them. No quotation is made from the others because their evidence has not yet been printed. Constructor Bowles, of the New York yards, says:

"Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I would like to ask a question. In your judgment—you speak of it being wise for the Government to construct ships in some yards for the advantages that will accrue—do you have any hesitancy in stating what you deem those advantages to be?

"Mr. BOWLES. I endeavored to go over those advantages in the beginning, and, generally, they are these:

"That it provides a means of maintaining the efficiency of the mechanical force and the machinery and plant; it renders repair work economical and rapid; it removes the tendency to increase alterations and repairs to existing vessels; it maintains a standard of workmanship with which we can require the contractors to comply, and it provides training for those who must inspect the contract work. Those are the material things for which you will pay. * * *

"I will say a few words now about the general subject of building ships in the navy-yards. I recommend the building of some vessels in the important navy-yards of the United States, because I believe it to be good business; and if I owned those yards and kept them for the purposes they are now kept for, I should say that it would be a sensible thing to do to build one ship in each of the important yards all the time, simply to keep them in order and maintain a sufficient force ready for all emergencies.

"Mr. METCALF. I want to ask Mr. Bowles, if he has no objection, to state what navy-yards are now ready to build ships.

"Mr. BOWLES. I am familiar with the New York yard and the Norfolk yard, and I believe on this coast those two yards are ready to take up any work you see fit to give them. I do not know about the Mare Island yard of my own knowledge, but Mr. Baxter was the constructor there for a number of years, and he is fully qualified to express an opinion about it. I believe it is capable of taking up the work.

"The CHAIRMAN. We are very much obliged to you, gentlemen, for your instructive statements, and if there are no further questions we will adjourn."

Constructor Stahl, of the Norfolk yard, says:

"Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I would like to ask you a question, going back to the matter that we have had under discussion. You have Mr. Bowles's statement. Summarizing his statement, or answering, what in your judgment would be the wisest thing for the Government to do—construct or not to construct vessels in the navy-yards?

"Mr. STAHL. I think there is no doubt whatever about the advisability of constructing a certain proportion of our ships in the principal navy-yards. To me this seems so self-evident a proposition that it hardly needs argument.

"Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Is that answer predicated upon the same reasons assigned by Mr. Bowles?

"Mr. STAHL. Substantially the same. There is one thing I might add. Briefly, I think we can build at some of our principal yards, equipped with modern tools as they are, even more cheaply than Mr. Bowles thinks, and I see no reason why we should not build as cheaply there as can be built at any private yard.

"Mr. METCALF. In your judgment would it lessen the cost of repairs if they had one or two vessels on the stocks?

"Mr. STAHL. There is no question whatever; it is as certain as anything can be.

* * * * * * *

"In the case of the Indiana the Government paid out for extra work—I did not just now mean to say $3,000,000; in the Oregon it was nearly $3,000,000—but in the Indiana the Government paid out for this identical work $2,300,000. In the one case the navy-yard spends $3,000,000, and then $2,300,000 more. Then we say, and say truthfully, that the navy-yard ship has cost $5,300,000 altogether. But you go and ask the price of the corresponding ship that was built at the private yard, and, unless the man you ask is well informed, he will say the contract price was $3,000,000, leaving you to infer, if you choose, that that was the total cost.

"Mr. MUDD. That is what I want to get at.

"Mr. STAHL. That is the erroneous comparison. The contract price is not the total cost. It is only a portion of the total cost; and in some cases it has been barely half the price.

"Mr. MUDD. From the result of your observations I would judge that in past times building in navy-yards did not cost any more.

"Mr. STAHL. No; I am of the opinion that many of the comparisons made in the newspapers have been very misleading.

"One word more about this inspection. You paid $80,000, plus a good deal more, to inspect the work on the Kentucky. If you built that ship at a Government yard, you would have to inspect the work also, but the same men who do the designing and superintending would do the inspecting, and it would not begin to cost you anything like that sum. Furthermore, consider the contract price of the Kentucky, $2,250,000. I tried to get the cost of the changes on her, which I know to be large, though doubtless entirely proper, but I could not get them in time. When you contracted for that ship, you did not include the furniture, or the blocks, or boats, or cooperage, and lots of other things in the contract. I built those articles at the Norfolk Navy-Yard. They cost $50,000. What did the Kentucky really cost? That $50,000 must be added to her contract price. So must also the cost of inspection, cost of authorized changes, and many other items. That sort of thing goes right straight through. There lies the danger of making a wrong comparison. A comparison of the contract price in the one case and the actual cost in the other is utterly misleading."

Says also Constructor Baxter:

"Mr. WHEELER. Do you think it would be wise or unwise for the Government to construct one or more ships at this yard?

"Mr. BAXTER. I do consider it would be very wise for the Government to construct a certain number of ships at its yards.

"Mr. WHEELER. Do you indorse the view taken by Mr. Bowles and Mr. Stahl in regard to keeping a ship constantly under construction in a yard?

"Mr. BAXTER. I think that is a great advantage.

"Mr. DAYTON. What is your opinion, under present conditions, if we should undertake to do any work in navy-yards; what character of vessels do you recommend should be given to the yards and what given to contract?

"Mr. BAXTER. I should give armored cruisers to the navy-yards.

"Mr. DAYTON. The great big ones?

"Mr. BAXTER. Yes, sir.

"Mr. DAYTON. The largest vessels ever undertaken—the new types?

"Mr. BAXTER. Yes, sir.

"Mr. DAYTON. Will you give your reasons for that?

"Mr. BAXTER. Because in doing that the yards are able to do anything else they will ever be called upon to do; that is the reason.

"Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Would that be in any sense an experimental construction on the part of the yards?

"Mr. BAXTER. No, sir; not at all; no more than any other work that is undertaken here. There are certain set plans and certain set specifications, and the people in charge use skill and knowledge and judgment in directing and carrying on the work.

"Mr. HAWLEY. Could you give the construction of an armored cruiser as large as 12,000 tons to a navy-yard?

"Mr. BAXTER. Yes, sir."

[Mr. BARBER addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BARBER. I hope, Mr. Chairman, that I may have leave to extend my remarks, or have additional time in the morning.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks that he may have leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DRIGGS. I would like to ask the same permission.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PAYNE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 10450) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

INTERNATIONAL UNION OF AMERICAN REPUBLICS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

In my message to Congress of December 5, 1899, referring to the insured maintenance for another period of ten years of the International Union of American Republics, I stated that "in view of this fact and of the numerous questions of general interest and common benefit to all of the Republics of America, some of which were considered by the First International American Conference, but not finally settled, and others which have since then grown to importance, it would seem expedient that the various Republics constituting the Union should be invited to hold, at an early date, another conference in the capital of one of the countries other than the United States, which has already enjoyed this honor."

Since then the Secretary of State has informed the governments of the various republics of this continent of our wish to see another conference convened and has received formal favorable replies from some of them in response to my suggestion, and an expression of their willingness to send delegates to a second conference. From a majority of the other republics this Government has received oral assurances of a similar tenor, so that at the present time the recommendation made in my message is assured of the approval of the American republics.

In view of these facts and of the desirability that should the conference be called at an early date, the expenses of the delegation to be sent by the United States may be provided for, I recommend to the urgent consideration of the Congress that it appropriate from any funds in the public Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be made immediately available, the sum of $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to meet the actual and necessary expenses of the delegates to the conference and of their salaried clerical assistants, said fund to be at the discretion of the Secretary of State.

WILLIAM McKINLEY.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, April 16, 1900.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. BAKER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 8347. An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, and for other purposes; and

H. R. 4696. An act granting an increase of pension to Ruthven W. Houton.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. WRIGHT, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

To Mr. BENTON, for one week, on account of important business.

To Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana, indefinitely, on account of serious illness.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

And accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 2 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Supervising Architect submitting an estimate of appropriation for rent of quarters for public officers at Indianapolis, Ind.—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Public Printer submitting an estimate of appropriation for engines, boilers, etc., at the Government Printing Office—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Attorney-General submitting an estimate of appropriation for repairs of United States jails—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Light-House Board submitting an estimate of appropriation for an auxiliary steam steel light-vessel at Martins Reef, Lake Huron, Michigan—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, recommending an appropriation for establishing quarantine stations at Fleming and Mullet keys, and certain legislation relating thereto—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Light-House Board submitting an estimate of appropriation for a light-ship at Grossepointe, Mich.—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the conclusions of fact and law in the case of the vessel snow Isabella, James Helm, master, against the United States—to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Secretary of War, submitting an estimate of appropriation for payment to William S. Yeatman for services rendered the Gettysburg National Park Association—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several Calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. MUDD, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 8067) to incorporate the National Society United States Daughters Eighteen Hundred and Twelve, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1019); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. JONES of Washington, from the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 10656) to provide American register for the steamship Garonne, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1020); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, Mr. GRAFF, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 726) for the relief of Alice Walsh, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1018); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, committees were discharged from the consideration of bills of the following titles; which were thereupon referred as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9410) granting an increase of pension to John G. Tate, of Frogtown, Pa.—Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 3277) for the relief of the Cape Fear and People's Steamboat Company—Committee on Claims discharged, and referred to the Committee on War Claims.

A bill (H. R. 3278) for the relief of Thomas S. Lutterloh—Committee on Claims discharged, and referred to the Committee on War Claims.

PENSIONS TO SOLDIERS OF THE MEXICAN WAR.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am directed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6959) to extend the provisions of an act entitled "An act granting an increase of pension to soldiers of the Mexican war in certain cases," approved January 5, 1893, to report it favorably without amendment. I desire to ask the immediate consideration of this bill, and I will make a very brief statement.

The original Mexican pension act granted a service pension of $8 per month to all soldiers who served in that war. January 5, 1893, it was amended, granting an increase to $12 per month to all the soldiers of that war who were in extreme physical suffering or destitution, provided their names were on the rolls at that time. Since that time a few of those soldiers have been added to the rolls, and this bill simply provides that the provisions of the act of January 5, 1893, granting the right of an increase to $12 per month shall be extended to them. It is a very simple measure, and it ought to be passed.

The Secretary read the bill; and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to extend the benefits of the act entitled "An act granting increase of pension to soldiers of the Mexican war in certain cases," approved January 5, 1893, to all survivors of the Mexican war who are pensionable under existing Mexican war service pension laws, and who have become or may hereafter become wholly disabled for manual labor and in such destitute circumstances that $8 per month are insufficient to provide them the necessaries of life, irrespective of the date of the granting of the service pension.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ENSIGN GEORGE IZARD MIDDLETON.

Mr. MARTIN. I am directed by the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 31) to authorize the appointment of George Izard Middleton an ensign in the Navy, to report it favorably without amendment.

Mr. TILLMAN. It will take but a moment to pass the joint resolution, and I ask unanimous consent that it be taken up and passed.

The Secretary read the joint resolution; and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. PROCTOR introduced a bill (S. 4237) granting a pension to Frances Helen Lewis; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 4238) granting a pension to John Crosby; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. RAWLINS introduced a bill (S. 4239) removing the charge of desertion against George A. McKenzie; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CULBERSON introduced a bill (S. 4240) to fix the compensation of United States commissioners in Chinese deportation cases; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, in the absence of objection.

Mr. HOAR. Should it not go to the Committee on Finance rather than to the Committee on the Judiciary?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas asks that it shall go to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HOAR. It will be out of the ordinary line of the duties of the Committee on the Judiciary. On the other hand, it would seem natural to have it go to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CULBERSON. I have no objection to the bill being referred to the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that that is the proper committee.

Mr. CULBERSON. Very well; let it go to that committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. FAIRBANKS introduced a bill (S. 4241) granting an increase of pension to William T. Gratton; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 4242) granting an increase of pension to James F. Nosler; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. TURLEY introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Claims:

A bill (S. 4243) for the relief of Patrick Twohig;

A bill (S. 4244) for the relief of Jane T. Williams;

A bill (S. 4245) for the relief of the Columbia Athenæum, Columbia, Tenn.;

A bill (S. 4246) for the relief of Simon Witkowski; and

A bill (S. 4247) for the relief of the estate of John Kerr, deceased.

Mr. CHANDLER introduced a bill (S. 4248) for the relief of Andrew H. Russell and William R. Livermore; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. McMILLAN introduced a bill (S. 4249) for the relief of John Ranald; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas (by request) introduced a bill (S. 4250) authorizing Albert H. Howe, James J. McAlester, William G. Weimer, Eugene E. White, and their associates to organize a corporation in the Indian Territory to construct an electric railroad, and granting them right of way for an electric railroad in said Territory, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. GALLINGER introduced a bill (S. 4251) providing for the adjudication by the Court of Claims and Supreme Court of pension claims involving difficult or important questions of law as a means of establishing judicial precedents for the guidance of the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Pensions; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. CLAY submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $10,000 to complete the work of improving the Lafayette State road in Georgia, from Lee and Gordon's Mills in that State to the town of Lafayette, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PERKINS submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $5,000 for the construction of a chapel at the navy-yard, Mare Island, Cal., intended to be proposed by him to the naval appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committtee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DANIEL submitted an amendment proposing to resettle, readjust, and pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, all claims of the States of New York, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Virginia, South Carolina, and the city of Baltimore for and on account of advances and expenditures made by them in the war of 1812 to 1815 with Great Britain, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

SOUTH CAROLINA STATE CLAIMS.

Mr. TILLMAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to adjust the accounts between the United States and the State of South Carolina, on the following basis, and report what amount will be due said State June 30, 1900:

First. Take the amount due the State of South Carolina on July 19, 1832, for moneys expended in the war of 1812, as shown in a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury of January 9, 1900, calculate the interest on same to date of the maturity of the bonds of South Carolina held by him as custodian of the Indian trust fund, to wit, January 1, 1881; deduct the amount due by the State, principal and interest, on bonds, from the amount due the State by the United States, and calculate interest on balance to June 30, 1900, thus showing the amount, principal and interest, due the State at that date.

Second. Add to this amount the sum due the State of South Carolina for moneys expended in the war of 1836-37, as shown by the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, February 20, 1900, calculating the interest on said amount up to June 30, 1900.

SENATOR FROM PENNSYLVANIA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning business is closed, and the Chair lays before the Senate the following resolution.

Mr. MASON. When in order, I desire to ask unanimous consent to take up a bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution reported by Mr. TURLEY from the Committee on Privileges and Elections January 23, 1900, as follows:

Resolved, That the Hon. Matthew S. Quay is not entitled to take his seat in this body as a Senator from the State of Pennsylvania.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois is recognized.

ABANDONED PROPERTY IN INSURRECTIONARY DISTRICTS.

Mr. MASON. I desire to ask unanimous consent that Senate bill 602 and pending amendments be voted on one week from to-day at the hour of 1 o'clock.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. What bill is that?

Mr. MASON. It is the same one the Senator objected to the other day.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The bill is not under consideration.

Mr. MASON. If the Senator will allow me to explain, I will state that the bill was introduced by the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS].

Mr. HAWLEY. We are unable to hear in this part of the Chamber. I should like to know what bill it is.

Mr. MASON. I am trying to state. The bill was introduced by the senior Senator from Minnesota. It was called up by him and read. A similar bill has been reported several times. It is the bill mentioned the other day to which the senior Senator from Connecticut objected.

Mr. HAWLEY. My inquiry is what the bill is. What is the name of it?

Mr. MASON. It is a bill to——

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. To pay the amount due for captured and abandoned property, and cotton, in the Treasury Department.

Mr. President, a single word, if I may be permitted, in entering an objection. These unanimous-consent agreements very often work harshly when made, and I am unwilling to consent to fixing a time for a vote upon a measure which is not before the Senate and which has had no discussion. I do not know whether such a request is in order, for certainly the bill is not before the Senate; it is not under consideration; it has had no discussion. I do not think that unanimous consent for a vote ought to be asked under such circumstances.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. MASON. I wished to say before the Senator sat down that the bill has been before the Senate, that it has been called up by unanimous consent, and that it would have been voted upon by unanimous consent after the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS] explained the matter fully, but it went over upon the understanding that it might be called up again. It is now, as I understand it, first or second on the Calendar, and I simply desire to give notice that I shall hope to go to the Calendar and dispose of this business.

TAX SALES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. PROCTOR. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (H. R. 8406) to amend an act entitled "An act in relation to taxes and tax sales in the District of Columbia."

The Secretary read the bill; and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to amend section 4 of the act of February 28, 1898, entitled "An act in relation to taxes and tax sales in the District of Columbia," by striking out all after the word "sale," in line 8 of that section.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

Mr. HOAR. I ask that the unfinished business be laid aside informally.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. HOAR. I will state my request. It is that Senate joint resolution No. 53, introduced by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE], be laid before the Senate.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator will allow me to have the privileged resolution laid aside?

Mr. HOAR. Informally.

Mr. CHANDLER. Yes; I think that ought to be the order of business, and I presumed the Senator from Massachusetts would ask that the resolution in reference to a seat in the Senate from the State of Pennsylvania may go over until after the routine morning business to-morrow.

Mr. HOAR. The request I made was that it be laid aside informally; but, if you prefer, let it go over until to-morrow.

Mr. CHANDLER. I understood the Senator to speak of the unfinished business.

Mr. HOAR. That had just been laid before the Senate.

Mr. CHANDLER. The unfinished business I supposed was the Philippine measure.

Mr. HOAR. The Chair laid the Quay resolution before the Senate and that is now before the Senate, and I asked that it be laid aside informally.

Mr. CHANDLER. I understand that to be the Senator's request, and that is entirely proper.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I ask consent to call up the bill (H. R. 5485) providing that the State of Wyoming be permitted to relinquish to the United States certain lands heretofore selected and to select other lands from the public domain in lieu thereof.

Mr. HOAR. Will it be likely to take any debate?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I hope not. It simply provides for the relinquishment of certain lands in the State of Wyoming now held by the General Government. I will say, however, to the Senator that the bill is somewhat lengthy, and it may take some time to read it.

Mr. HOAR. Perhaps the Senator will allow it to come up at a later hour to-day?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Possibly I may have an opportunity to call it up at a later hour. It is a bill of very great importance to the settlers in my part of the country.

Mr. CHANDLER. I object under the circumstances. We have laid aside the resolution in reference to a seat from Pennsylvania in order that the Senator from Massachusetts may not be interrupted, and I think therefore I will object to all other business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire objects.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. That settles it.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I propose, in the remarks I have to make this morning, to cite a good many documents from the reports of our commanders and consuls in the East. I desire leave to have those documents printed as a part of my remarks in full, although I do not desire to have them read in full, and shall state in a sentence or two the substance of them. I wish to have them printed in full so that nobody may suggest that there was any suppression or perversion of their contents. I ask leave that that may be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I am in rather an uncomfortable condition as to health, and I desire to ask that I may say what I have to say without interruption unless I shall misstate any Senator. If I should do so, I would expect, of course, to yield to him for any correction he might wish to make. I ask the Secretary to read Senate joint resolution No. 53.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the joint resolution.

The Secretary read the joint resolution (S. R. 53) defining the policy of the United States relative to the Philippine Islands, introduced by Mr. BEVERIDGE January 4, 1900, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Philippine Islands are territory belonging to the United States; that it is the intention of the United States to retain them as such and to establish and maintain such governmental control throughout the archipelago as the situation may demand.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, when, on the 8th of July, 1898, less than two years ago, the lamented Vice-President declared the session of the Senate at an end, the people of the United States were at the high-water mark of prosperity and glory. No other country on earth, in all history, ever saw the like. It was an American prosperity and an American glory.

We were approaching the end of a great century. From thirteen States we had become forty-five States. From 3,000,000 people we had become near 80,000,000. An enormous foreign commerce, promising to grow to still vaster proportions in the near future, was thrown into insignificance by an internal commerce almost passing the capacity of numbers to calculate. Our manufactures, making their way past hostile tariffs and fiscal regulations, were displacing the products of the greatest manufacturing nations in their own markets. South of us, from the Rio Grande to Cape Horn, our Monroe doctrine had banished from the American continent the powers of Europe; Spain and France had retired; monarchy had taken its leave; and the whole territory was occupied by republics owing their freedom to us, forming their institutions on our example. Our flag, known and honored throughout the earth, was welcomed everywhere in friendly ports, and floated everywhere on friendly seas. We were the freest, richest, strongest nation on the face of the earth—strong in all the elements of material strength, stronger still in the justice and liberty on which the foundations of our empire were laid. We had abolished slavery within our own borders by our constitutional mandate, and had abolished slavery throughout the world by the influence of our example.

Our national debt had been reduced with unexampled rapidity. We had increased it somewhat for the necessary expenses of the war. But if it had all been due, we could have paid it all in a single year by a tax solely upon the luxuries of the rich, which the rich would scarcely have felt, and which would have vexed no manufacture and no branch of commerce. Rich in all material wealth, we were richer still in a noble history and in those priceless ideals by which a Republic must live or bear no life.

From all over the country came the voice of well-paid labor, dwelling in happy homes, full of contentment with the present and of hope for the future. Capital was seeking new investments on all sides. Our domestic market, rescued from foreign invasion, was our own. Foreign markets were opening. The balance of trade was on our side. The product of American industry was carried abroad on an overwhelming and increasing tide.

We had won the glory of a great liberator in both hemispheres. The flag of Spain—emblem of tyranny and cruelty—had been driven from the Western Hemisphere, and was soon to go down from her eastern possessions. The war had been conducted without the loss of a gun or the capture of an American soldier in battle. The glory of this great achievement was unlike any other which history has recorded. It was not that we had beaten Spain. It was not that 75,000,000 people had conquered 15,000,000. Not that the spirit of the nineteenth century had been too much for the spirit of the fifteenth century. Not that the young athlete had felled to the ground a decrepit old man of ninety. It was not that the American mechanic and engineer in the machine shop could make better ships or better guns; or that the American soldier or sailor had displayed the same quality in battle that he had shown on every field—at Bunker Hill, at Yorktown, at Lundys Lane, at New Orleans, at Buena Vista, at Gettysburg; in every sea fight on Lake Erie or on the Atlantic. Nobody doubted the skill of the American general, the gallantry of the American admiral, or the courage of the American soldier or sailor. The glory of the war and of the victory was that it was a war and a victory in the interest of liberty. The American flag had appeared as a liberator in both hemispheres; when it floated over Havana or Santiago or Manila, there was written on its folds, where all nations could read it, the pledge of the resolution of Congress and the declaration of the President.

Every true American thanked God that he had lived to behold that day. The rarest good fortune of all was the good fortune of President McKinley. He was, in my judgment, the best beloved President who ever sat in the chair of Washington. His name was inseparably connected with two periods of unexampled prosperity, made more impressive by the period of calamity which came between them. The people believed that to the great measure called by his name was due a time of happiness and comfort never equaled in this country, and never approached by any other. It was the high-water mark on this planet of everything that could bring happiness to a people. But high as the tide reached then, it went still higher under the operation of the policies which came in with his Administration.

He had won golden honors by his patriotic hesitation in bringing on the war, and by his interpretation of the purpose with which the people at last entered upon it.

When I say that President McKinley was the best beloved President that ever sat in the chair of Washington, I do not mean, of course, to compare the reverence in which any living man is held with that which attends the memory of Washington or Lincoln. But Washington and Lincoln encountered while they were alive a storm of political hostility, which President McKinley has fortunately been spared. I repeat, that it seems to me that President McKinley holds a place in the affection of the people at large which no one of his predecessors ever attained in his lifetime.

The promise which the President and the Senate made as to Cuba we have, so far, done our best to redeem. When the Spanish fleet was sunk and the Spanish flag went down from over Havana, peace and order and contentment and reviving industry and liberty followed the American flag. Some of us had hoped for the same thing in the East. We had hoped that a like policy would have brought a like result in the Philippine Islands. No man contemplated for a moment the return of those islands to Spain. One of the apostles would as soon have thought of giving back a redeemed soul to the dominion of Satan.

The American people, so far as I know, were all agreed that their victory brought with it the responsibility of protecting the liberated peoples from the cupidity of any other power until they could establish their own independence in freedom and in honor.

I stand here to-day to plead with you not to abandon the principles that have brought these things to pass. I implore you to keep to the policy that has made the country great, that has made the Republican party great, that has made the President great. I have nothing new to say. But I ask you to keep in the old channels, and to keep off the old rocks laid down in the old charts, and to follow the old sailing orders that all the old captains of other days have obeyed, to take your bearings, as of old, from the north star,

> Of whose true fixed and resting quality
> There is no fellow in the firmament, and not from this meteoric light of empire.

Especially, if I could, would I persuade the great Republican party to come back again to its old faith, to its old religion, before it is too late. There is yet time. The President has said again and again that his is only an ad interim policy until Congress shall act. It is not yet too late. Congress has rejected, unwisely, as I think, some declarations for freedom. But the two Houses have not as yet committed themselves to despotism. The old, safe path, the path alike of justice and of freedom, is still easy. It is a path familiar, of old, to the Republican party. If we have diverged from it for the first time, everything in our history, everything in our own nature calls us back. The great preacher of the English church tells you how easy is the return of a great and noble nature from the first departure from rectitude:

"For so a taper, when its crown of flame is newly blown off, retains a nature so symbolical to light, that it will with greediness reenkindle and snatch a ray from the neighbor fire."

I for one believed, and still believe that the pathway to prosperity and glory for the country was also the pathway to success and glory for the Republican party. I thought the two things inseparable. If, when we made the treaty of peace, we had adhered to the purpose we declared when we declared war; if we had dealt with the Philippine Islands as we promised to deal, have dealt, and expect to deal with Cuba, the country would have escaped the loss of 6,000 brave soldiers, other thousands of wrecked and shattered lives, the sickness of many more, the expenditure of hundreds of millions, and, what is far worse than all, the trampling under foot of its cherished ideals. There would have been to-day a noble republic in the East, sitting docile at our feet, receiving from us civilization, laws, manners, and giving in turn everything the gratitude of a free people could give—love, obedience, trade. The Philippine youth would throng our universities; our Constitution, our Declaration, the lives of Washington and Lincoln, the sayings of Jefferson and Franklin would have been the text-books of their schools. How our orators and poets would have delighted to contrast America liberating and raising up the republic of Asia, with England subduing and trampling under foot the republic of Africa. Nothing at home could have withstood the great party and the great President who had done these things. We should have come from the next election with a solid North and have carried half the South. You would at least have been spared the spectacle of great Republican States rising in revolt against Republican policies.

I do not expect to accomplish anything for liberty in the Philippine Islands but through the Republican party. Upon it the fate of these islands for years to come is to depend. If that party can not be persuaded, the case is in my judgment for the present hopeless. That party will be in power for the next twelve months. It will be continued in power for at least four years thereafter. If it were otherwise, what we do within the next twelve months could not be undone without the consent of a Republican Senate. Our majority in the Senate for at least four years is assured; and if that were doubtful there are Democrats enough committed to this expansion policy to make it sure if the bulk of the Republican party determine to continue it.

I can not look with any favor upon Mr. Bryan as an alternative. I can not believe that there is anything to hope for from his election. Upon all other questions than imperialism he announces no single doctrine, principle, or purpose which has in it anything either of prosperity or safety to the Republic. And I can not forget that when it was attempted to defeat the Paris treaty, or at least to compel an amendment which, if it had been done, would have put the Philippine Islands upon the same footing with Cuba, would have prevented the war, and would have preserved our national doctrines of liberty and our ancient policy, it was due to Mr. Bryan, more than to any other man after the treaty left the hands of the President, that that attempt was frustrated. Unless he is much misrepresented he used all his power and influence with those of his friends who were ready to listen to his counsel to secure the ratification of the treaty. That ratification involved the continuance of the war, which had then proceeded no further than an unauthorized outbreak of hostilities and an assumption of sovereignty over an unwilling people—to be purchased by the United States—the cause of a year's war and all the disasters and melancholy history of the last twelve months.

I do not underrate the importance of this issue. It is greater than parties, greater than administrations, greater than the happiness or prosperity of a single generation. But in pleading for justice to these dusky millions of distant Asiatics, I can not forget 10,000,000 American citizens here at home, to whom neither citizenship nor manhood is hereafter to be worth having unless the Republican party stand by them. Who can fail to read the signs of the times? The Senator from Alabama, finding himself hard beset, made his bid for the favor of the Democrats of Alabama by proclaiming in his speech made in his place here, but meant for his campaign at home, the unfitness of the negro for self-government, and demanding the repeal of the constitutional amendments. And Alabama, even if she dislike his imperialism, will take him on those terms. Three States have adopted constitutions contrived with masterly ingenuity to exclude negroes from the right to vote. Others are getting ready to follow in their footsteps. The Senator from South Carolina, in an utterance whose terrible meaning is almost forgotten in our admiration for the manly frankness of the avowal, said, the other day, in the Senate:
